As I remember, the tables that were submitted showed that in place of 10 knots an hour this boat sometimes made only 7 or 8, and in some cases less than 6 knots an hour, and in one instance only about 3 knots, showing that the boat was then in a very imperfect condition. According to their own statement its screws were wrong, its speed was wrong, its battery was wrong, its shafts were wrong, its steering gear was wrong, and pretty much everything connected with it was wrong. And that was only two months ago.

Now, under date of January 19, 1904, eight days after the letter I have just read was written, the Acting Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Darling, wrote the following letter to these gentlemen:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 19, 1904.

SIRS: Your letter of January 11, 1904, to the Board of Inspection and Survey, relative to the test of the submarine boat Protector, has been referred to the Department. You are informed that the naval appropriation act approved March 3, 1903, authorizing the Department to contract for or purchase subsurface or submarine torpedo boats, provided that said purchase or contract should be preceded by comparisons or competitions with the boats already in the Government's possession, or those of any private competitor. In order to afford a basis for these comparisons and to determine whether the boats presented for trial would, if accepted by the Department, fulfill all reasonable requirements for submarine warfare, the Department prepared a "general programme of competitive trials of subsurface and submarine boats," a copy of which was furnished to all competitors who had expressed a desire to enter these tests. Since the act under which these tests are conducted in accordance with this programme provides for the test of a completed boat, the actual results attained by said boats when tested by the trial board will be considered as final for the purposes provided for in this act.

It is desired, therefore, that before you apply for a competitive trial of your boat you will furnish the Department with a formal statement in writing to the following effect, viz: "That the boat which you submit to the Department for test is at that time finally completed and that you are prepared to accept as final, for the purposes of this act, the results of which your boat is capable of developing on trial at the present time."

It is important that this should be clearly understood, as, in view of the competitive character of these trials, the Department can not allow them to be repeated, but will insist that the results of these trials when once held must be considered as final in the matter of determining the relative merits, under the act of Congress aforesaid, of the various competing boats.

Respectfully,

CHARLES H. DARLING,
Acting Secretary.

The LAKE TORPEDO BOAT COMPANY,
Bridgeport, Conn.

Under date of January 27, 1904, only a few days after the Lake Torpedo Boat Company admitted that their boat was defective in almost every essential particular, I notice that Mr. Lake did write to a citizen of the State of Connecticut a letter, which bears date January 27, in which he says:

Our submarine torpedo boat Protector has fulfilled the representations of Mr. Lake as to her capabilities of performance, as made before the Naval Committee last year. The Protector has been developed without the assistance of the Government, and will, no doubt, be duly purchased under the act of 1904—as every requirement heretofore officially made as to the qualities a submarine boat should possess to be of value to the naval service has been complied with and in many respects exceeded.

That was hardly a fair statement of the situation. This company had admitted on January 11 that their boat was in a very defective condition, and yet, under date of January 27, a letter is written to a gentleman in official life saying that the boat is in perfect condition and that they have no doubt the Government will buy it under the provisions of the naval appropriation act of the present year.

Now, Mr. President, if they are so confident that that will be done, I submit it is a very extraordinary thing for these gentlemen to undertake to get a provision of this kind on another bill.

Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a few moments longer. I have occupied more time than I had intended, but I wish to specifically call attention to the fact——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PENROSE in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1508) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection thereon of a public building to be used for a Department of State, a Department of Justice, and a Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana asks that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside. If there is no objection, it will be so ordered. The Senator from New Hampshire will proceed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I wish to call attention specifically to the fact that a little over one year ago the Lake Torpedo Boat Company petitioned Congress and submitted themselves an amendment to the naval appropriation bill, which was incorporated in that bill, and which reads as follows:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to contract for or purchase subsurface or submarine torpedo boats in the aggregate of, but not exceeding, $1,000,000: Provided, That prior to said purchase or contract for said boats any American inventor or owner of a subsurface or submarine torpedo boat may give reasonable notice and have his, her, or its subsurface or submarine torpedo boat tested by comparison or competition, or both, with a Government subsurface or submarine torpedo boat or any private competitor, provided there be any such, and thereupon the board appointed for conducting such tests shall report the result of said competitition or comparison, together with its recommendations, to the Secretary of the Navy, who may purchase or contract for subsurface or submarine torpedo boats in a manner that will best advance the interests of the United States in submarine warfare.

That amendment was submitted by the Lake Torpedo Boat Company to the Committee on Naval Affairs and it was incorporated in the naval appropriation bill at the request of that company, the amount to be appropriated having been fixed by the action of the two Houses at $500,000.

Again, in the present naval appropriation bill that precise provision is repeated, the appropriation being increased to $850,000. But before the $850,000 becomes available this company asks Congress to make a specific appropriation for one of their boats, the provision being put on an army appropriation bill.

I think it is extraordinary. I think it is not fair to competitors. I think it will be setting a precedent that will come back to trouble us in the future.

I hope sincerely, Mr. President, that this duplication of authority may not be granted by legislative action. We have been trying during the last few months to get rid of duplication in the various Departments of the Government, and we have made some progress in that direction. Now it is solemnly proposed that we shall duplicate the building of submarine boats, so as to put a part of them under the Navy Department and a part of them under the War Department.

I have sympathy for these inventors, Mr. President, as I have sympathy for all American inventors. I come from a country of inventors not quite as ingenious as the people of Connecticut, whom my friend on my right so ably represents. We make real things always in our State. It is said that they do not always do that in Connecticut.

But this Lake Torpedo Boat Company is a real thing, and they make a real boat. There is no question about that. And I have reason to suppose that it is a good boat. Nobody is questioning that. I have sympathy for them. They have expended their own money or that of their friends in bringing this boat to a partial state of completion, and I think we ought to give them encouragement, as we did give them encouragement in the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. President, I do not want to attack these gentlemen on any point, and yet I think I am justified in reading from the record what these gentlemen said about the cost of the boats. It will be found in the hearings before the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, Document No. 395, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session. The chairman said:

You had better furnish the committee with your blue-print illustrations.

Mr. LAKE. Yes, sir. I wish to say something now in regard to Admiral Bowles's recommendation. I understand he recommends an appropriation of $500,000, to be appropriated for four boats, but we do not understand that by that he meant that each boat should cost $125,000. We do not think he would expect us to furnish a boat with twice the horsepower, three times the armament, about fifty-five tons greater displacement, more speed, with a diving compartment, which is a valuable feature for mining and countermining, and a vessel which has a superstructure and sufficient surface buoyancy to enable her to ride the seas so that she is a seaworthy craft for the same money as some of these smaller boats.

The CHAIRMAN. What can you furnish one of these boats for?

Mr. LAKE. The price we named there was $175,000. We have not yet completed this boat. We do not know what it will cost us, but I will say here that we can not furnish such a boat as we are proposing to furnish for $125,000. If you will let us put in one torpedo tube and one screw and reduce our displacement to that of the Holland, I think I would accept the Admiral's figures.

The CHAIRMAN. Your amendment says, as you read it, I remember, three boats, to cost $175,000. Do you mean $175,000 each?

Mr. LAKE. Each; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. That is about the same price as the Holland boat.

Mr. President, that tells its own story, and I am not going to elaborate on that point. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars may be a fair price. I will not debate that, but in my judgment it is a very large price for this boat, and perhaps a larger price than we ought to pay.

I have been furnished with a letter from the Holland Torpedo Boat Company bearing on this question of price, on the amount that is named in this bill, which I want to read for the information of the Senators who are honoring me with their attention. The letter is as follows:

HOLLAND TORPEDO BOAT COMPANY,
New York, March 9, 1904.

SIR: We are informed that the Senate Committee on Appropriations has favorably reported a provision appropriating $250,000 for the purchase of the submarine boat Protector from the Lake Torpedo Boat Company. In this connection we invite your attention to the following considerations:

In connection with the various proposed appropriations for submarine boats for the Navy, Congress has adopted the principle that such appropriations shall be open to competition by all American inventors or builders who have qualified by building a successful boat or boats. This principle was invoked at the time when the Protector was merely projected and again when she was building, this to the detriment of the only successful builders at that time, viz, ourselves. If this principle is sound for the Navy, it must be sound for the Army; and in justice to ourselves we ask that it apply, and submit the following proposition:

For the sum of $250,000, which it is proposed to expend for the purchase of the Protector, we will furnish to the Government two submarine boats.

The first will be of practically the same type and dimensions as the boats now owned by the United States Government, but containing many improvements and designed entirely for use as torpedo boats. This we will furnish for the sum of $170,000.

The second will be a smaller vessel, peculiarly adapted for the work of destruction and repair of mine fields and cables, and will be of such dimensions as permit it to be readily transported on battle ships, transports, or flat cars, so as to enable it to be placed in its field of operations, which primarily is a port or passage mined or held by an enemy, where it facilities for attacking mines and cables and its auxiliary facilities as a torpedo boat proper would both be useful. This vessel we will furnish for the sum of $80,000.

These vessels we will furnish under guaranties as to their performance in every respect.

If after a full consideration by proper expert authorities it is considered good policy to combine in a single vessel the functions of a submarine torpedo boat and a submarine mine destroyer and repairer, we are prepared to submit designs for such a vessel for comparison with the Lake boat Protector, and, if our design be preferred, stand ready to build the vessel under guaranties as to its efficient performance in all respects.

Very respectfully,

HOLLAND TORPEDO BOAT COMPANY.
ELIHU B. FROST, Secretary.

Mr. President, the whole question of submarines and their war tactics has been and is now the subject of earnest discussion in the Navy, which service has a monopoly of practical experience with such craft at the present time.

In the near future very severe competitive trials are to be held, open to all American types of submarines, upon the result of which the Navy Department's future action in this matter will largely depend. The Lake boat has been offered for this competition, and this will be the first opportunity for severe and exhaustive tests with this boat, such as have been required with the boats now owned by the Government. In this connection I beg to call attention to a debate in another place, which can be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 2544, and from which I quote:

1. The joint board of army and navy officers, composed of experts of the General Staff of the Army and of the General Board of the Navy, and of which Admiral Dewey is president, is now specially considering the question of the utilization of the submarines for coast-defense purposes. The number, character, and size of such boats are now being specially considered, and it is simply embarrassing these military experts to authorize such construction of submarines at the present time.

2. Within the next six weeks the Board of Inspection of the Navy will commence conducting an extended series of competitive tests to determine the merits and defects of the Holland and Lake designs of submarines. The Board of Inspection have been giving special consideration to this subject during the past year, and they have prescribed tests and conditions which will secure for the Navy Department and for the Congress special information upon disputed points.

Congress heretofore has consistently refused to finally adopt any one type of submarines, notwithstanding the advantages in the matter of secrecy which are thereby assured. The principle of competition has been consistently urged and accepted, even to the extent of delaying action on known types until vessels projected in building could be completed and tried, and the Lake Company has the advantage of this proposed competition. This principle having been adopted by Congress for the Navy Department, it would appear only fair to all builders of submarines that the same principle be adopted for the War Department.

The Lake boat has never had any severe and exhaustive trials, such as have been successfully passed by the boats now owned by the Navy. Its ability to perform the various functions claimed for it has never been demonstrated before a competent board, working under rigid conditions. In fact, the most elementary features connected with the efficiency of the submarine, after its ability to run submerged, viz, speed and radius of action, are unknown features as regards this type. The builders have made extravagant claims in this connection; but so far the boat's capabilities have never been demonstrated before any board. In connection with this it would be well to remember, as I have already shown, that there is on file in the Navy Department a letter from the Lake Torpedo Boat Company, dated January 12, 1904, admitting defects in the boat immediately connected with these important matters, and that the Board of Inspection and Survey to the Navy Department in reply to the letter from the Lake Company, also called attention to that fact.

Now, Mr. President, I do not know that I care to say a single word further. I will close as I commenced by saying that this matter has been given the most careful, conscientious, and painstaking consideration by the Committee on Naval Affairs. We have listened to these gentlemen with great attention and great courtesy. We did last year precisely what the Lake Torpedo Boat Company asked us to do. We put in our bill the amendment drafted by themselves. We have repeated it in the present naval appropriation bill, thus placing that company on a par with every other competing company. Under those circumstances it does seem to me bad public policy for the Government to make provision on an army appropriation bill for the purchase of a boat of a particular type, when in the Navy the most severe competitive tests are to be insisted on. We ought to be consistent in this matter.

I submit, Mr. President, that I have no prejudice in this matter. If the Senate in its wisdom concludes to do what the committee recommends, no one will yield more gracefully than myself. But I think it is bad legislation. I think it is mischievous legislation. I think it will come back to trouble us. I think it will make friction between the two Departments of the Government and will result in harm rather than good.

One word more, simply, and I am done. It was said that the War Department practically recommended this purchase because the Lieutenant-General of the Army recommended it. Mr. President, I am not at liberty to say something I might say, but I will venture the suggestion that if this matter could be left to the head of the War Department for a recommendation I would be willing to abide by the recommendation the Secretary of War might make regarding this proposed purchase of a Lake torpedo boat, feeling sure that such recommendation would end this controversy.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut obtained the floor.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator let me say just a few words? I am compelled to go out on committee work, and I can not be here any more to-day.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am very glad the Senator from New Hampshire read the letter that has been sent around by authority of the Holland Torpedo Boat Company. I have the letter with the signature, and I suppose it was sent to nearly every one. It confirms what I said in the few remarks I made in the beginning, that the Holland Torpedo Boat Company is fighting this appropriation, and in doing so is making a great mistake.

Mr. GALLINGER. They are fighting for competition, and they are practically entitled to it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. There is more than that, Mr. President. There is an argument connected with that letter against the report of the army officers, criticising them.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am going to refer to that. In connection with this circular letter they sent out quite a lengthy typewritten letter accompanying it. Here it is. They state in this letter:

Reasons why proposed appropriation of $250,000 for one Lake boat for the War Department should either be defeated or left open to competition.

Now, there is a good reason why this boat will cost more than the Holland boat, and as the Holland Company has presented a communication, which has been read by the Senator, I will read a reply by Mr. Lake to that letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 10, 1904.

SIR: A circular letter has been sent out, the first page of which is on a letter head of the Holland Torpedo Boat Company. This letter is under date of March 9, 1904. Its object is without doubt to defeat the provision put in the fortification bill by the Senate Appropriations Committee, notwithstanding the recommendation for the purchase of five submarine boats of the Lake type by the army board on submarine defenses and its approval by the General Staff and the recommendation of Generals Chaffee and Gillespie for the purchase of one of these boats for the School of Submarine Defence. This recommendation was not made by the board until after a thorough investigation of the problems involved had been made and an investigation of other types as well, held under the auspices of practically the same board, which spent a year or more in its consideration of this matter. The letter is purported to be signed by Elihu B. Frost, secretary of the Holland Torpedo Boat Company, and quotes some prices at which they will furnish boats of the Holland type, and claims that two of their boats combined, one at $170,000 and another at $80,000, are capable of doing as good work as one of the Protector type at $250,000.

In reply to this will state that if they could do this (which we claim is impossible for them to do without infringement of our patents, of which we have in the neighborhood of thirty, with over 400 claims on our method of construction and devices for operation of our type of submarine), there would be nothing gained, as each boat would be necessarily inferior to the Protector type, and would at the same time require two crews. As to competing in price, the Lake Torpedo Boat Company's boat is cheaper than the Holland boats almost any way one can figure. On the price per ton of displacement we are cheaper; on horsepower developed we are cheaper; on armament we are cheaper. We furnish three torpedo tubes to their one. We are twin screw; they single. We have a diving compartment; they have none. This provides for escape of the crew in case of disablement of machinery, and also cable cutting, mine laying and repairing, countermining, etc.

Our boat also provides a superstructure and deck, which gives buoyancy and makes her seaworthy; also permits the storage of gasoline in the superstructure, where the fumes of same will not escape into the living quarter of the boat and asphyxiate the crew. In fact, the advantages of the type are so great that one prominent naval officer who was most familiar with both types of boats has been quoted as saying, after showing a Government official in another branch of the service over the Holland boats, "Now I will show you a boat worth a dozen of any one of these," and brought the officer over to the Protector.

It is, however, a waste of time to discuss the respective merits of the two boats here; that has been determined by the report of the board on submarine defenses during an investigation of a year or more and unanimously decided in our favor. That report and recommendation is what the letter above referred to is trying to discredit. They inclose with the circular letter an argument headed as follows: "Reasons why proposed appropriation of, etc." (See 1.)

It is proposed to offer an argument in opposition to their ex parte reasoning, applying to each clause of their letter hereto annexed.

Now, I will ask that the Secretary may read the balance of that paper. When it shall have been read I have nothing further to say except simply that I do think the Holland Company are making a wrong move. I think they are mistaken in opposing this amendment. I think it is our duty, that we owe it to ourselves, to the country, and to the defense of the country that we shall not permit them to have an exclusive monopoly in the construction of these vessels.

Let us buy this vessel; let us test it, and then we can have competition hereafter; but, no, the Holland Company do not want competition; they do not want us to buy one of these vessels; they do not want us to try them; they want to force us to accept one of theirs, and I do not believe that is right.

Mr. GALLINGER. Just a moment, if the Senator please. Will the Senator accept, in lieu of the proposed amendment by the committee, the provision as found in the naval appropriation bill opening it to competition?

Mr. COCKRELL. No; really, I am for this amendment. I do not want any competition. I am perfectly satisfied to risk the $250,000 provided for in this amendment. If I had my way I would appropriate a million dollars to build one of these vessels, making it a seagoing vessel, on the largest scale possible, to go from one end of this country to the other; one which could leave New York, go to London, and come back again without being under the necessity in the meantime of taking on supplies of any kind, and which could at the same time operate under the water as well as one of these small boats. I would do that, and I think I would be doing my country a service and putting in its hands a power of defense and of offense which no other nation on this earth would have.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the remainder of the paper be read.

Mr. PROCTOR. Very well.

The Secretary read as follows:

CONFLICT OF AUTHORITY.

There is no conflict in this case, as the Army now has charge of the submarine defenses, and this provision permits the Army to have a boat with which to broaden its legitimate field and strengthen its defenses by experimenting with a boat themselves. The Navy heretofore has had exclusive use of submarine boats for experimental purposes, but as the type possessed by that arm of the national defense is not adapted to mining and countermining, they are not suited for military use in mine defense as is the Protector and her order.

SCOPE OF MILITARY AUTHORITY.

It is the function of the Artillery Corps under the Army to plant, keep in repair, and control the submarine defenses. The Protector is especially qualified for this work. It can not be done from surface boats in rough weather and when there is ice on the surface. Neither can it be done under fire in case of a blockade of a port or harbor.

ARMY BOARD OF EXPERTS.

We think the army board of submarine defenses, which is composed of experts in this matter and have been submerged under the most severe conditions possible, should be better able to judge of this than the author of the Holland document.

As to the statement that efficient submarines can keep an enemy's fleet out of range of the mine fields, we agree that this is true if the Government had efficient sea-going submarines, but that they have not got them at present is shown by the fact that when it is desired to take any of the present boats from one port to another they invariably tow them. It is well known that two of them have recently been wrecked while being towed from New York to Norfolk. They were considered so unsafe that the Department would not even permit a steersman on board; they were sealed up and towed like logs. We have never been compelled to tow any of our type of boats, and we have made long trips entirely unescorted and in some of the worst storms we have had on the coast. We have traveled from Norfolk to Newport entirely under our own power in submarines of our own type.

In this connection we wish to state that we believe the proper type of vessel for the needs of the Navy is a submarine of greater endurance and capable of making long voyages if necessary at a sufficient speed to keep along with a battle squadron. We submitted designs for such a vessel to the Navy Department about three years ago, but there has been no legislation that would permit us to build such a craft. France is laying down this year six of such vessels practically on similar designs, and as they have for the past four or five years been building vessels of the Lake type, almost identical as first proposed to the Department in 1903, after having abandoned the diving type, the spectacle is again shown of an American invention being recognized abroad in advance of in our own country—in this case, owing entirely to legislation in favor of the Holland Company.

The clause above also seeks to cast reflections on the judgment of the board by saying: "The commander who would use his submarines to repair mine fields when they could be used offensively against the fleet seeking to attack would never be classed among the Deweys and the Farragute." Here is one of the most important points in favor of the Army having submarines as auxiliaries to port and mine defenses. It is conceded by all army officers we have consulted with that the Navy should have charge of the submarines for coast and off-shore use or to attack a foreign port; but the Army should have the use of submarines also, possibly detailed to them under the command of naval officers, but to be ready instantly to cooperate with the Army in taking care of the fixed mines and also to assist in the defense of a fixed base. This is the question we understand the joint board is to decide; but that has no bearing on this particular case, as the proposition now is to provide a vessel capable of demonstrating all of these features in the practical experimental work essentially within the province of the School of Submarine Defense; and no one will deny but that it is of paramount importance that the Army should know for themselves how valuable an assistance this will be to them in augmenting the defense against an active enemy. Otherwise they might give the submarine more importance than it deserved, and consequently rely on a broken reed. The question of ultimate jurisdiction may well be left to the joint board; and then, after the School of Submarine Defense has finished its experimental work, the boat can be turned over to the Navy, if the joint board so decides.

MONOPOLY OF EXPERIENCE NOW WITH NAVY.

It is true that the Navy "has a monopoly of practical experience with such craft at the present time." It is also true that one company (the Holland) has had a monopoly up to the present time, having had appropriations during the past ten years to assist them in their experiments to the extent of $1,340,000, while another company (the Lake) has not received one penny from the Government, but has developed a type of boat from its own resources, which the document sent to the members of the Senate and House by the Holland company in substance states: Give us additional favors and we will also give you, in two smaller boats at a cost the same as the Lake company is asking for one, the same features as the Lake type possesses. This interpreted evidently means if the United States Government will assist and protect them by awarding them a contract on a design they will take the experience of the Lake company and build you a boat that will accomplish as much as the Protector, already built. Does this mean that they are going to take the fruits of our twenty years of labor, confiscate our ideas that are protected by nearly 30 patents and over 400 patent claims, and the results that we have attained in almost a lifetime of experimentation and risk of life time and time again? We can not believe that any honorable Senator or Representative of this great Government would consent to be a party to this wrong. We hope this is not the Holland company's intent, but all the signs point that way.

SOME COMPETITIVE TESTS COMING.

They say in the near future severe competitive trials are to be held. They have been saying they were ready to enter into competition trials at any time ever since May 21, 1902. See Document No. 123½, Committee on Naval Affairs, House of Representatives, pages 46 and 47, in which Mr. Rice, president of the Holland Company, claims he is ready to enter into direct competition with us at any time, etc. Also Senate Document No. 395, Committee on Naval Affairs, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, June 6, 1902, pages 40 and 41, statement of Mr. Butler on behalf of Holland Company; also page 62, Mr. Creecy on behalf of the same company. Now, what are the facts? The records in the Department will show that we have been trying most strenuously ever since June 1, 1903, to get the Holland Company to enter into direct competition, but they have declined. See testimony Secretary of the Navy, Document No. 50, Committee on Naval Affairs, January 25, 1904, in which Mr. Moody said: "The Holland people have declined a test. We are going on with the test of the Lake boat, which is now up at Newport. The board of inspectors, I am informed, will conduct that test just as soon as the ice will permit." We have not as yet received any notice that they will enter into a direct competitive test with us on the same waters and under the same weather conditions as the Protector, and do not believe that they will venture to do so.

The attempt is here made to claim credit for themselves for the open competition for all American inventors. We respectfully submit that we are the ones that have brought about the law providing for competition; and that has been our contention all through this controversy during the past three years; and the law now in force with reference to submarines is the language of our first petition for consideration by the Government. See Committee on Naval Affairs, Document No. 123, House of Representatives, page 1, 1902, the petition being submitted on March 3 of that year. It has also been the language of our subsequent bills and petitions, while, on the contrary, the Holland Company have been introducing numerous bills specifying Holland boats, and have persistently either specified Holland boats by name or have so worded their bills as to cut out any other type. We are not objecting to competition now, but are demanding it to demonstrate the respective value of the two types for naval needs; but we have had the competition to demonstrate the respective value for the Army needs as auxiliary to the coast fortifications and to assist in the mining defenses. This Holland document is evidently being sent out to confuse the members of the Senate and House on this point. The matter, however, has been decided by the authorities in our favor, and is so recommended by the board of submarine defense, the General Staff, and General Chaffee, Chief of Staff, and General Gillespie, Chief of Engineers. Surely there can be no stronger indorsement.

THE TRIALS OF LAKE BOATS.

As to the Lake boats never having had any severe or exhaustive tests, such as have been had by the present navy boats, we refer to an article by Lieut. John Halligan, United States Navy, in the last volume of the Journal of the American Society of Naval Engineers, who was nearly five months on the Protector and has testified to making numerous long runs, some continuous runs of over 100 miles in length and in rough weather, in the open sea.

Our previous boat, the Argonaut, also has a record of greater distance sails, both as a surface boat and a submarine, than any other submarine ever built, either here or abroad.

It is also well known to numerous other naval officers, who have seen our type of boats cruising on the coast and in the Chesapeake Bay during and after the Spanish-American war and have seen the Protector at New York, cruising in Long Island Sound, at the Oyster Bay maneuvers, and at Newport, and no one has ever seen her under tow.

Reference is made to a letter on file at the Department from us under date of January 12, 1904, admitting defects in our boats. This we deny, and submit herewith a copy of the letter referred to. What the letter does show is that the speed and endurance of the Protector, had she been tried then, would have fallen below our original estimate owing to inefficient propellers. Needless to say, the propeller problem is a problem common to all boats and has nothing to do whatever with the submarine problem, and while it is our desire to get as great speed and endurance possible out of the Protector, and we are now fitting larger screws, which, as the letter plainly states, necessitates the fitting of new shafts and change of rudders, which will give a further improvement to the boat, which we desire to do at our own expense before turning her over to the Government and not at the Government's expense, as has erroneously been stated elsewhere.

The object of the letter was, as it plainly states, to assist the Board of Inspection and Survey in their inspection and trials of the Protector and was delivered to them at Newport on their arrival there for that purpose and called their attention to features which, after a year's experience, we thought we could improve before turning her over to the Government, if found otherwise satisfactory to them on inspection and trial, not because of defects. We were anxious to enter upon our trials even as we were, knowing we could bring her up to the highest possible efficiency before turning her over to the Government.

The letter which follows speaks for itself:

THE LAKE TORPEDO BOAT COMPANY,
Newport, R. I., January 11, 1904.

SIR: It is our desire to anticipate the examination of the Protector by the Board of Inspection and Survey by a brief statement regarding certain of the present features of the boat. We believe we may thus facilitate the Board's work and help to a better understanding of the craft's condition and probable performance.

The speed and endurance of the Protector will fall considerably below our original estimate. This will be due to the present inefficient screws, fitted the day before we left Bridgeport, which have been tried progressively over the official mile course since our arrival here. The results of these trials are given in the following table, which we will be glad to have verified by the Board and incorporated accordingly in their report. It will be seen that the ratio of slip is out of all reason, and that speeds are away below the proper resultant of the power of the engines under their various conditions. New screws have been designed based upon the findings of these performances, and corrections have been made which promise us a speed of 10 knots under light cruising conditions.

The installation of these new screws, which must await our return to our home waters where proper mechanical facilities can be secured, will involve the fitting of new shafts and a modification and rearrangement of our rudders, both vertical and horizontal. The change to the vertical rudder will be a material improvement to the navigational power of the boat by bringing that rudder directly in the sweep of the thrust from the propellers.

Apropos of the steering gear of the craft, we should also advise the board that the present handwheel to the hydroplane controlling gear is not of sufficient size to give the speediest manipulation that may be desired in active service, and that, too, it is our intention to improve.

The batteries now in the Protector have been installed for more than a year, and while examination will disclose a very satisfactory condition of the plates after that lapse of time, certain mechanical details are subject to improvement. The present supporting lugs, while considerably heavier than those required in shore installations, have been strained by the racking effect of the heavy seas the boat has been exposed to since her commission a year ago. We submit herewith a model cell, showing an improved crossbar and connections which we are sure will obviate further trouble.

Should the board, after the examination of the boat, find her suitable for naval service, and so recommend, we, contingent upon that encouragement, will make all of these improvements at our own expense before turning the vessel over to the Government.

Very respectfully,

THE LAKE TORPEDO BOAT COMPANY,
SIMON LAKE, President.

Capt. C. J. TRAIN,
President Board of Inspection and Survey, United States Navy.

As a further answer we would state that the shoe is on the other foot, and if the records that are in the Department in regard to failures of Holland type of boat performance were made public it would astonish the whole country. This record extends from their first boat, the Plunger, and up to the present time they have failed to fulfill their guaranties then made in every particular.

Since then there have been continuous disasters and changes, numerous explosions, and two of the boats wrecked, owing to the necessity of towing them from place to place. Even now changes are being made to one of the Government boats on the recommendation of Naval Constructor J. J. Woodward, of the Board of Inspection and Survey, under date of November 27, 1903, which recommendation recites numerous defects and recites certain changes to be made, which recommendations cover nearly four closely typewritten pages. These changes are recommended to be made at Government expense and are now authorized.

ACCEPTANCE TRIALS OF HOLLAND BOATS.

In reply to the above clause, will state that the official trials of the Holland boats were made in a land-locked harbor of shallow depth, and the greater part of the so-called twelve-hour endurance runs were made with the boat's nose against the dock, and the submerged runs were made on a course one-fourth mile in length, because there was not sufficient depth of water in this shallow bay (Peconic Bay) to run longer courses. See report of Board of Inspection and Survey on acceptance trials of Adder and Moccasin, and one of the conclusions reached by the Board is as follows and can be seen in the report of the Board of Inspection and Survey addressed to the Secretary of the Navy under date of November 24, 1902:

"10. The Board therefore recommends the acceptance of the Adder, after such defects and items of unfinished work as are mentioned in this report and its appendages are satisfactorily completed.

"14. The board, however, desires to call the Department's attention to the fact that although the trials to which the Adder has been subjected fulfill the strict letter of the contract (see note) under which this vessel was built, yet they do not provide for any trial under service conditions at sea, and on account of the extremely novel character of the vessel it is impossible to predicate upon her performance in the smooth water of a land-locked harbor an opinion as to her behavior in even a moderate seaway. The board, therefore, considers that when the remaining vessels of this class are submitted for trial, one of them should be given endurance tests at sea, both in the light condition under the gasoline engine, and when submerged under the electric motor in the general manner, described more in detail in paragraph 16, II, of this report. In the absence of such a trial the board desires to expressly reserve its opinion as to the general questions of stability, maneuvering powers, and habitability when at sea, regarding which the opinions of the board are requested in the 'Instructions governing the trials of torpedo boats,' transmitted with the Department's precept.

"NOTE.—This contract was proposed exclusively by the Holland company and superseded by authority of Congress the former contract of the Plunger, which original contract, on the Department's desires, called for quite a different and more valuable performance."

From this it will be seen that the board reserves its opinion as to the ability of these vessels, and recommends that future acceptance trials be held in a different place and under different conditions.

Notwithstanding the recommendations of the inspection board to the additional acceptance, trials of the later boats have been made in the same locality.

SUBMARINE BOATS ON BATTLE SHIPS OR CRUISERS.

They suggest that smaller boats should be designed to be carried on the decks of battle ships or cruisers. We predict that the lumbering up of a fighting ship will never be permitted by any of the fighting officers of the Navy, and even if it should be permitted it would require ships of special construction, as there is no ship in the Navy that now has either the room or appliances for handling a very moderate-size submarine, as a boat of only 6 feet in diameter, with barely room for two men with little endurance and not at all seaworthy, would weigh at least 30 tons, and any officer or practical sailor knows it would be utterly impossible with a mother ship, as they suggested, fitted with especial appliances to handle them, to jack up such a craft in even a moderate seaway.

This is illustrated in the recent experience of the Adder and Moccasin on the coast when it was necessary for a sailor to jump overboard at the risk of his life to get a line to the Adder. These boats are so heavy in proportion to their size that if they should come with moderate violence in contact with another ship the storage batteries of the submarine would at least be ruined, even if the submarine or the mother ship were not sunk. To practical sailors this is one of the most ridiculous proposals yet made in connection with submarine warfare.

It may be accepted as a fact that submarines must be able to go on their own bottom and not in tow from port to port if they are to be effective and efficient in the field intended. It is peculiarly the seagoing qualities of our type that have shown for years, first by the Argonaut in her coast runs in severe weather, and later by the Protector, as well, too, by the French submersibles, which are similar to the Protector.

In respect to these small boats, the Navy Department has on file plans of a small boat submitted by us several years ago, which boats can be built for from $25,000 up, but we do not recommend them. As to comparative cost of boats, we will agree to furnish boats of our type, eliminating the diving compartment, with a single screw, one torpedo tube, and no superstructure for safe storage of gasoline, etc., but of the same size and power as the Holland, and capable of performing all that she is capable of doing, for $135,000, but do not recommend it. The Protector type costs at least 100 per cent more to build and is worth much more than the difference.

What we hope to build for the Navy is a cruising submarine of about 400 tons, the size that is now being laid down by the most advanced foreign countries and as was first submitted by us to the Department on June 20, 1901.

There are a number of additional arguments that could be made for complying with the Department's wishes in this matter, but we think sufficient has been said to show that the circular above referred to is an adroit attempt to confuse the minds of Senators and Representatives as to the actual facts in the case. I submit herewith a copy of the army board's report.

Yours, sincerely.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the provision of the naval appropriation bill in regard to submarine or subsurface boats was put in in the House of Representatives. It came to us from the House and was there very strongly supported and urged by the representatives of the Lake torpedo boat. At that stage they appeared to have been anxious simply for an open competition.

I think the House provision in the naval appropriation bill, which the Senate subsequently adopted, is a sound provision. Under that clause all submarine boats are submitted to the Department for a competitive test. If we are going to have any subsurface or submarine boats, I think they ought to be submitted to that test in order that the Government may get the best boat.

I think it is a mistaken policy, and I have always thought it a mistaken policy, for Congress to appropriate large sums of money for one particular pattern. This is a special boat, and an appropriation of $250,000 is asked for it. It has been examined by an army board. I do not think that our opinion here is of any value at all. I do not think that it is safe to go on the opinion of a single army board, and I think the whole policy of picking out patents of any kind and voting a large sum of money to a specific patentee is a mistaken system. I was opposed to taking the Holland boats by name, and I am opposed to taking these boats by name. I think the House provision of the naval bill is the sound provision for the Senate to adopt—that is, to open them all to competition.

That relates, Mr. President, simply to this specific case. We find the friends of this boat were anxious, first, for competition; then they come forward here and want $250,000 for their particular boat. I do not think that is good or prudent legislation.

But, Mr. President, the other objection that I have to it is a much more fundamental one, and I think of the most serious character. Submarine or subsurface boats like this boat are primarily vessels of war. The vessels of war of the United States ought to be under one head. It is true the War Department has got transports, has got tugs for its forts, and has got launches; but none of those are vessels of war. I think it would be a great deal better if the transport vessels were under the charge of the Navy; but whether they are or not, these vessels are all vessels not for war purposes.

This Lake torpedo boat is primarily a vessel of war. The work enumerated for her in the report, in almost every case, relates to operations of war. She is to be used to attack an enemy's fleet. The result of that will be that we shall have one kind of a navy under the War Department and another kind of a navy under the Navy Department. There will be constant conflict, constant friction. It is as utterly wrong in the principle of military administration as anything can possibly be. The fighting force at sea, under the water or upon the water, should be under one head. That is a truism of ordinary military operations. Here we are proposing to start under the War Department another navy.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator think that our submarine mines laid in our rivers and harbors for defense should also be under the Navy Department?

Mr. LODGE. I think it would be much better if they were under the Navy Department.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, of course, to be justified in his argument and make it at all logical, the Senator would have to be in favor of that; but I assume that he will admit that so long as the school of mines and mining and submarine work is under the War Department, and so long as the laying of those mines, the care of them, their taking up, etc., in all our harbors is under the War Department it would be as necessary that the tools, utensils, and heavy machinery, movable or otherwise, therefor should be under that Department.

In that case this submarine torpedo vessel becomes one of the necessary adjuncts or implements—more necessary, indeed, than the army transports which take the United States troops from one place to another. Transport ships could be hired, but we could not hire submarine boats like the one comprehended in this amendment; hence we must purchase and own or do without.

Mr. LODGE. The business of laying mines is the least thing about this boat. The laying of mines is not difficult. They have been laid without this boat and laid successfully for many years. This boat is to be used for other kinds of naval operations. It is to be used to cut cables; it is to be used to attack the enemy's fleet; is is to be used to scout; and here you are to set up in every harbor of this country a navy under the War Department, under separate command from the Navy Department, which can make attacks, which can try to pick up cables, which can do scouting, which can enter upon every sort of operation without any relation to the fleets of the United States whatsoever. The matter of laying down mines has been done for many years by other boats.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, yes.

Mr. LODGE. It can be done in all sorts of ways. It is the least important thing about this boat. I have read over what the boat is for. The boat is primarily a weapon of war. In the statement of the report it says:

> First, to replace fixed mines, by lying adjacent to the forts and attacking vessels attempting to reduce the works or to run past, particularly in important channels where it is impracticable to plant mines, owing to deep and rough water, extreme width, or swift currents.
> Second, to supplement fixed mines by attacking vessels approaching the mine fields or those which have crossed them.
> Third, to lie outside mine fields for scouting or picket duty, keeping in telephonic communication as hereafter described.
> Fourth, to pick up and repair defective cable joints, junction boxes, etc.
> FOR THE ATTACK.
> First, to run past the forts and attack vessels within the harbor.
> Second, to drag for, pick up, and cut multiple and branch cables on the bottom or mine cables leading to bouyant mines or buoys.
> Third, to sweep the channel.

With two exceptions every one of those operations is an operation of war of the naval force, and we are to have the Army ordering one naval attack and the Navy in charge of another, destroying every bit of responsibility, bringing the two services into immediate conflict, and nothing is more important than to avoid conflict between the services. I will venture to say that neither of the eminent gentlemen in charge of the Departments at this moment wants this confusion created.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to ask the Senator how important, in his opinion, it is that we should have a boat that can sweep the channels of our own coast and cut mines and cables? This boat does not go out to foreign ports. The Senator from West Virginia says it is not a seagoing vessel. I think the owner claims it is.

Mr. LODGE. I supposed under the head of "For the attack," running past forts, and attacking vessels, it did not mean that it would run past our own forts and attack our own vessels in our own harbors. That, of course, would be an absurdity. I supposed that this boat, for which so much is claimed by its inventor, as has been read here, was to go everywhere, and it is to go under the direction of the War Department.

Now, good administration divides the Navy Department and the War Department, the Navy being under one head, the Army under another. There is not a nation in the world that confuses the two departments, and the object, it seems to me, of sound military administration is to keep those Departments distinct in their different fields, so that all friction between them may be avoided in time of warlike operations.

It seems to me that the objection to this amendment, aside from the detailed objections to the amount appropriated for a special patent on what seems to me insufficient testimony, is that it is a departure from sound administration. If we want to have this torpedo boat especially appropriated for, the place for it was in the naval bill and not in the bill for fortifications. I do not think it belongs to the Army at all to enter into the charge of naval war vessels, and this is a naval war vessel. If it is not that, it is of no particular consequence. As to the matter of laying mines, that can be done in many ways. The great things claimed for this boat are its power of attack and defense, of scouting, of assailing the enemy's vessels. That must be in charge of the naval authorities. Any attack on a hostile fleet or hostile vessels ought to be in charge of the admiral of the fleet, not of the General of the Army with one fleet and the Admiral of the Navy with another fleet. I do not think that the amendment ought to be included in this bill for fortifications.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, the point of order has been decided, and so clearly that no question can be raised upon it, and the Chair has laid down principles which will be valuable in determining other points. But the Senator from New Hampshire and to some extent the Senator from Massachusetts claim that this is not germane, proper, and relevant on a bill making appropriations for fortifications. I think the proper test of what is germane and relevant is not the article itself which is provided for but the use to which it is to be put, its purpose; and the purpose of this boat is legitimately one for army use. As the Senator from Massachusetts said, the Army has boats now. Some of them, I think, are of exactly the same type as some of the naval boats—transports and dispatch boats.

Mr. LODGE. Has it any vessel of war—any fighting ship?

Mr. PROCTOR. It has had armament on board of its vessels—cannon.

Mr. LODGE. They never were permanent. Has it any fighting ships?

Mr. PROCTOR. The War Department lays these mines, the wires spreading over the harbors in all directions and out for several miles, and the machinery controlling them is in a bombproof in the fort, and of course entirely under army supervision.

Now, it seems to me there can be no question that the vessel used to care for those mines, to place and replace them, to take them up, should be under the control of the Army. The logic of the Senator from Massachusetts would put the entire system of coast defense into the hands of the Navy. That is something which will hardly be accomplished. It is just as necessary and proper for the Army to have boats, no matter if they are identical with boats of the Navy, if they are for proper army use, as it is that the Navy should have them.

In regard to the appropriation, I believe with the Senator from New Hampshire, although I do not think I carry the doctrine quite so far as he does, that not everything can be determined by a competitive examination. I believe that is the Senator's view.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will pardon me, I would hardly apply it to boats tested by experts.

Mr. PROCTOR. I think this is a case where it can not so well be determined by competition as it can be by actual use; and I do not think it is an extravagant or unwise thing. Both of these boats have earnest friends. I know nothing about the Lake boat, but it is evident that experts and men of good judgment think it has great merit. I do not think it is unwise to purchase one of them and give it a trial in actual use.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I move, in line 17, page 3, to strike out the words "and fifty."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 17, after the word "hundred," it is proposed to strike out "and fifty;" so as to read "$200,000."

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I have heard the testimony respecting the value and the work intended to be done by the submarine torpedo boat of the Protector class, which is the subject-matter of this amendment to the fortifications bill. While not pretending, except in the most minor degree, to be a judge of boats in this class, I will say that I have been deeply impressed by the ingenuity and the apparent utility of such a boat as this. We have seen maps and drawings and have heard mechanical explanations of the organisms and work of this boat. To my mind it is a marvel of inventive ingenuity. Were I to feel competent to judge in any professional way of such a work, I would say that I am satisfied that this boat will make for itself, when fully tested and put to work, a vindication of its character.

But, Mr. President, I am not satisfied that it would be wise upon the part of this Government, with the little that we know about this craft, to appropriate the $250,000 asked for by this amendment. This boat differs from the submarine boats which we have heretofore ordered for our naval service. It has a doorway that opens down into the water, and one of the crew can step through that door down upon the bottom of the sea and go rummaging around to find wires and mines. The water will not flow into the boat when this is done, because it is met with a counteracting force of compressed air in some mysterious way which is assured by the mechanics who have to do with the matter and which candor compels me to say I do not completely understand.

This boat also has wheels, side-lever wheels, so that by touching certain machinery the boat may be run on wheels in the bottom of the ocean. What sort of speed it can make on those wheels or how far they are useful, I am not able to say, but that is a part of its mechanism, indeed, with a little improvement this boat, I suppose, might go about the land on its wheels and prove to be a perfect amphibious product, serving the Army on land and the Navy at sea. It is a very wonderful invention.

But, Mr. President, this boat has not received the test which it seems to me a boat of this description should receive before we invest $250,000 in a sample of it for experimental purposes in harbor defense.

The proprietor or inventor or head man of the corporation that controls this boat appeared before the Committee on Appropriations. He said—I think conversationally—that the boat cost him something like $400,000, but in that estimate of the cost of the boat he counted all of his experiments, perhaps running through a series of years, as respects the various devices that enter into the construction of the boat; and I suppose with a little more liberality of calculation he might have made it cost a million or two millions, for it would have been just as pertinent to the cost of this boat to have added the expense of the education of the youth at college and all the incidental expenses of his life which had enabled him at a particular time when he produced the boat to organize and invent such a craft.

We have no testimony whatever, except of that loose and speculative kind, either of the cost or the value of this boat, and there is not a business man in the country who, if he were purchasing a great tool of this description for his plant, would think for one moment of buying it before giving a more businesslike regard to the details which enter into a calculation of its value. I know of no man in the Senate, Mr. President—while some I know have had very liberal experiences, trainings, and education—who could pass upon the value of such a boat as this. My honorable and distinguished friend the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] is one of the most distinguished seamen of the country. He started on a sailing craft and has had large and valuable experience with maritime life and things. That worthy and distinguished gentleman thinks this boat might be built for $150,000, if I understand his judgment upon the subject. But by counting what the inventor may have spent in his various enterprises of experimentation, you can easily run it up to $400,000, or any figure which anyone might desire, depending upon what he would count as assets to the Government in the matter of cost.

If, however, this boat should prove upon a fair and just test to be the valuable thing which it is claimed to be, the inventor will derive a revenue from the future sale of such boats made by his house. It seems to me his friends or the friends of this boat and the advocates of this amendment are forcing the season and are anticipating things which have not happened and are putting the Government into this experiment when it is at too immature a stage to justify the Government in spending $250,000 for this boat.

I was greatly impressed, Mr. President, by the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts and by those I also heard from the Senator from New Hampshire. Some contend, and amongst them the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], that this is a matter of army administration, and that this boat should be made, under the Secretary of War, a part of our military in contradistinction to other military forces.

If this be true, we look in vain to the War Department for any recommendation on this subject. The War Department has entered upon no line of work with reference to submarine craft of this order. The War Department has confined itself to land defenses, to land forces, and to the things that belong or pertain to the land, and if we were proceeding in order we would await the reflection, consideration, and recommendation of the Secretary of War rather than ourselves take the initiative and force upon the Secretary of War something that has never been addressed to his consideration and of which we have most fragmentary and merely speculative knowledge.

I do not think that the Senate of the United States, Mr. President, upon a bill foreign to such a matter as this, is that body which is best qualified to initiate a new line of departure with respect to our national defenses undiscussed, and, so far as we know, unconsidered by the head of the War Department. So, if it be true, and I scarcely conceive that it logically is, that this is a matter for War Department administration, it seems to me those who so contend have argued themselves out of its being a matter for our present consideration, for it has not approached us from any such avenue nor is it a part of any army bill.

It is true, Mr. President, that what are land and what are naval defenses can not always be discernedly differentiated by an exact line. We put maritime soldiers, so to speak, or marines, upon ships, and they become a part of the naval forces, and if it became necessary in military defenses, in fortifications, and in other positions upon the land for subsidiary naval forces to be under the Secretary of War, experience would show that there is no reason why Congress might not follow the line of its judgment in that respect. But as to this matter and in this stage of fortification, unquestionably the Navy has the superior attitude, especially with respect to this case. Here in the naval bill which has but just passed this body the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to contract or purchase subsurface or submarine torpedo boats in the aggregate of but not exceeding $850,000.

Mr. President, the Navy in its organization and its system of work is prepared to give to the Navy those tests and that system of scrutiny and examination for which the War Department is unequipped, and with respect to which also it is unpracticed. So we are innovating upon a plan which we have this very year followed out duly and logically in providing for the purchase of eight torpedo boats under the naval establishment and of subjecting them to certain tests under the organization and administration of the Navy Department for which it is fully prepared, and now it is proposed to stretch our hands outside of the line of the organisms which we have constituted and to pick up one unknown and not thoroughly tested torpedo boat and apply it to harbor defenses.

Mr. President, if we should require the Secretary of War to enter upon this new rôle of inquiry, it seems to me we ought to limit the amount of money according to some standard of judgment. We see the millions and the hundreds of thousands fly out of the Treasury into a pocket here and a pocket there as lightly and as inconsiderately as if they were copper pennies or nickel pieces in the hand of some one who had plenty of small change in his pocket. It is nothing to the Senate of the United States whether you pay $300,000 or $400,000 or $500,000 or $50,000 for this boat. I fear, Mr. President, we are getting a little too inconsiderate of the amounts which we expend.

We are in an atmosphere in which, however much we may praise economy, and however much we may know as a matter of theory that it must lie at the foundation of the success of good administration in every family and in every nation, the man who raises the suggestion of it has everyone else around him raise their hands in holy horror and say unto themselves: "He is merely playing a peanut game." With all the dislike to occupying such a position, I beg leave to say to the Senate that the appropriation of $250,000 for the purpose of purchasing this boat or any boat of its kind which has been looked into or examined by any representative of this body is not justified by any testimony given before anyone who represents the Senate. If $150,000 were appropriated for this purpose, in my humble judgment it would be sufficient; $200,000 would be liberal; $250,000 is extravagant and unwarranted.

Now, Mr. President, it is contended that we ought to enter upon the enterprise of putting torpedo boats of this description into the line of our military land defenses under the Secretary of War, because this boat is the right sort of a craft to have to hang around a harbor, to lay down mines in a harbor, to cut wires, and to carry torpedoes with which to assail vessels which may be attacking that harbor.

I beg to say, Mr. President, that a submarine craft of this order has a much wider range of operation than is indicated in that analysis and description of its prospective work. Submarine craft of this character is designed and intended to rove the seas. It belongs to the sea department of offensive and aggressive war. It is intended to go after the works of the adversary, not simply to help to lay down your own works.

It is intended to plow the main and to go after ships of the adversary with a fleet of aggressive warships which seek to destroy them. There is no partition of this craft as a part of the natural naval forces of the United States which would not also separate from the Navy the big guns and the ironclad ships which we are putting upon the ocean.

Therefore, Mr. President, I offer, for the considerations I have adduced, the amendment, which cuts off $50,000 of this appropriation. If we are going to experiment in this way, let us at least have an eye to doing so somewhat in conformity with the facts which have been laid before us.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, when I first had the honor of becoming a member of this body all my sympathies were with the Navy. I have been, more or less, all of my life connected with maritime matters and affairs, and if I know anything perhaps it is about vessels that ply upon the deep. But when I was placed upon the Committee on Coast Defenses I found that there was another side to the question, and I went in and examined it as much as my limited time would permit me to do so. I first ascertained that in 1887 and 1888 what was known as the "Endicott Board" had prepared a plan of defense and fortifications for our principal harbors and seaports. There were twenty-seven ports and harbors in their original plan. Since that time it has been progressively modified, until it now embraces thirty ports.

When we had our trouble with Spain I naturally looked to the Navy to fortify our harbors and ports, but to my surprise I found that it was all under the direction and charge of the Engineer Corps of the Army. Further investigation convinced me that that was the proper place for it. There is no mode of defense more certainly known than that of submarine mines with the high explosives, the great value and utility of which we have recently discovered.

My friend from Virginia always speaks so interestingly and entertainingly that it is like a poem to listen to him; yet his remarks imply that all the vessels of our Government are under the charge and control of the Navy. I wish to say to him that under the Department of which the Secretary of War is the chief we have a fleet of United States transports aggregating a gross tonnage of about 67,000 tons. We have one ferryboat of 309 tons. We have nine passenger and freight boats, which include cable ships, hospital ships, refrigerator ships, aggregating 1,400 tons. We have thirteen tugs, of about 1,800 tons; six lighters, of 1,000 tons, and twenty-three launches, averaging from 3 to 18 tons each. In the Engineer Department we have 283 vessels, consisting of tugboats, propellers, steam lighters, dredgers, snag boats, steam ho sters, towboats, and launches.

We have purchased by the Government, and in the employ of the Mississippi River Commission, thirty-nine stern-wheel steamers, dredgers, towboats, and launches. In addition to this we have our whole revenue-cutter system, our light-house tenders and ships, our Coast and Geodetic Survey steamers, our Fish Commission vessels—the Albatross and various launches—and others. We have many vessels belonging to the Marine-Hospital Service. These make in the aggregate twice the number of vessels, although less tonnage, than there is in the Navy.

If I had my way, I think I would place everything practicable under the direction, control, and charge of the Navy, where our officers are educated in a nautical school, where the men employed on the vessels come in from the forecastle and go on up through the grades, learning it as a profession. But it is impracticable to do so. Therefore we must accept the situation as it is; and if we should determine that the War Department is not the proper Department under which to place our coast defenses, we must start in and reorganize our whole plan of government so far as it relates to the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War.

When this matter was presented to your committee, I at once said, being a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, it properly belongs to the Naval Committee. However, when these people several times came with their boat to the Naval Committee I said to them, "It belongs to the coast defenses." They admitted it, and in the abstract it might be true, for it was for coast defenses. Yet they said, "We want it here; we want nautical men to demonstrate the feasibility and practicability of our great discovery, which we claim is better than a battle ship or any coast-line vessel or any line of armor-clad vessel for coast defense."

Now, my friend from New Hampshire did not come in and open it out to competition and say, "We will give every one a chance." Oh, no; the committee of Congress made it mandatory upon the Secretary of the Navy to build the Holland type of boat. It was mandatory upon the Secretary of the Navy that he was not to open it to competition, but we provided that he should have the Holland type of boat and no other built. What has been the result? We have expended one million three hundred and twenty-odd thousand dollars on the Holland type of boat, and if it has been the grand success its friends claim for it, it does not appear so from any records which have been submitted to your committee.

Therefore I say it is business policy, it is wise statesmanship, to say to the Secretary of War, "You are charged with defending our ports and our coasts." The title of the bill enumerates what is the purpose. So we say to him, "In that system of submarine defense we will give you one boat for trial." Do we make it mandatory upon him? Oh, no! Your committee say, "If, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, he deems it advisable and expedient, he may build this boat," and not that he shall pay $250,000 for this boat, but that he shall pay such a sum as he believes the boat may be worth. Surely, before he enters into this contract he is going to bring into his counsel engineers and maritime men who know whereof they speak and who will give him the benefit of their knowledge, the benefit of their experience, because we place the responsibility upon the Secretary of War before he orders the boat.

Mr. HOPKINS and Mr. GALLINGER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. Do I understand the Senator to say that if this amendment is adopted the Secretary of War does not necessarily pay the $250,000?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly not.

Mr. HOPKINS. And if in his judgment $100,000 is sufficient he may pay that sum?

Mr. PERKINS. I suggested the effect of the amendment upon the question asked me by my friend from Virginia. He asked, is this vessel worth that much money? I said, it is a less price for the displacement per ton than we paid for the Holland type of boat, for it is. The displacement in tons for the Holland type of boat is much higher than it is. But we purposely amended the provision so that the Secretary of War is given discretion as to the advisability of purchasing the boat, and the responsibility of the price is left upon him and the War Department.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I may have misunderstood the Senator. I know he would not purposely misrepresent my attitude. I understood the Senator to say that I had not been consistent as to this matter of competition; that at some time the Naval Committee recommended an appropriation diretly for the Holland boat.

Now, Mr. President, I will suggest to the Senator that, so far as I am personally concerned, when the question of competition arose in that committee I favored it, and I have favored it ever since. What may have occurred before I became a member of that committee I can not speak for.

Mr. PERKINS. I certainly did not intend, even by implication or inference, to reflect upon the Senator. The fact remains, however, that the bill came in from the committee to the Senate and became a law. I will read the act, and it is similar to the provisions in other acts. This is the provision of the act approved June 7, 1900:

> The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to contract for five submarine torpedo boats of the Holland type of the most improved design, at a price not to exceed $170,000 each: Provided, That such boats shall be similar in dimensions to the proposed new Holland, plans and specifications of which were submitted to the Navy Department by the Holland Torpedo Boat Company November 23, 1899.

Mr. GALLINGER. What is the date of the act?

Mr. PERKINS. It is the act of June 7, 1900.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, there are just two points of interest in this connection. I was not a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs at that time, and I think I am safe in saying that there was then no other submarine torpedo boat that had been offered to the Government except a boat of the Holland type.

Mr. PERKINS. That is very true, but in the spirit of invitation to inventors we might have opened it to competition. I think our friend from New Hampshire was not then a member of the committee, and so I stand corrected.

As a member of this committee for eight or ten years, it was most refreshing to me to find that an inventor came to our committee and said: "Gentlemen, I have invented what I believe to be a valuable auxiliary to the Government in the defense of her coast ports. We have demonstrated it. We have built a boat. A board appointed by the Secretary of War has examined the boat. We want no subsidy. We simply want you to give the Secretary of War the power to purchase a boat if, in his opinion, she comes up to the requirements—not this boat, but a larger one; one that may go to sea if it is necessary; one that may steam from Eastport, in Maine, to Galveston if it is necessary. We have thirty harbors to defend on the Atlantic and the Gulf coasts and on the Pacific, and we want to be prepared, because it is the best bond for peace when we are in a position to defend ourselves."

We all know when we had our little difficulty a few years since with Spain that you could not come down the river here without slowing down your steamer as you approached the submarine mines. They were the best defense that it is possible to have in preventing an enemy from coming into the harbor of Norfolk and attacking our navy-yard, or from coming up the river.

Now, Mr. President, I have no earthly interest in this boat. I never saw the inventor until he came into our committee room. And I say it is on broad lines, it is on much broader lines and better lines, that we should give him this opportunity of selling our Government his boat, provided he can demonstrate to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War that it will do all he claims and all the board of army officers who reported upon it say it will do.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from California a question.

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN. I should like to know whether the Senator does not think the Secretary of the Navy is fully authorized already, by a provision incorporated in the naval appropriation bill passed a few days ago, to buy this boat, if he thinks it is necessary or desirable for the national defense?

Mr. PERKINS. I took that position when the bill was first presented to us, but after the joint board of the Navy and Army were invited to consider it, and after Lieutenant-General Chaffee, Chief of Staff and Commander of our Army, wrote to the Secretary of War that he was unable to convene the joint board on account of the absence of Admiral Dewey, Admiral Taylor, and several other members of the board, yet he earnestly recommended to the Secretary of War that we purchase one boat instead of five, I believed it wise for us to delegate that power to the Secretary of War.

Mr. MARTIN. If the Senator will permit me, he has not answered my question. I should like to know whether, in his judgment, the naval appropriation bill authorizes the purchase of this boat if the Secretary of the Navy chooses to do so?

Mr. PERKINS. I think the Secretary of the Navy, under the provision of the naval appropriation bill reported from the committee of which the Senator from Virginia and myself are members, has a right to invite a competitive test of the respective boats, and if he approves it he can purchase the boat.

Mr. COCKRELL. But in that case the War Department could not use it.

Mr. PERKINS. It then would not be under the control of the War Department. That Department has control to-day of all submarine mines. The Navy Department has never placed a submarine mine at any harbor or port which has come to the knowledge of your committee.

Therefore your committee, after considering the matter carefully as to the price, agreed upon the amendment. I agree with my friend the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] that if it were mandatory and the dimensions of vessels were given here, the amount at which they value the vessel, with her displacement and her machinery, as they described it to us, I would not pay such a price.

But we are not setting ourselves up as experts, Mr. President. We are leaving that responsibility where it should properly go—to the War and Navy Departments, who have eminent men in their respective professions, educated at West Point and at the Annapolis Naval Academy at the expense of the Government, who have come up by gradations, step by step, in a competitive examination as to their respective merit, and by that right they occupy their present positions.

I believe, Mr. President, we can well rest this question with the War Department, for the Secretary of War will surely refer it to the joint board of the Army and Navy, and whatever they decide upon I am sure will be that which they believe is in the best interest of the country.

I wish to emphasize the fact once more, before I take my seat, that it is the first instance which has come to that committee where the parties did not ask a bonus for something they described upon paper to us or for a model.

There were the Howell gun carriage, the pneumatic gun carriage, the Isham shell, the Emery gun carriage, the Gathmann gun, and twenty, aye, fifty, other inventions, for every one of which an appropriation was desired before they commenced to do the work, to carry out a plan which they said could not fail. But these parties excited my admiration, because they came and said: "It has been done at our expense. We have spent half a million dollars or more; we have constructed what we believe to be a perfect submarine vessel that will lay cables, that will take up those which are entangled, that will find torpedoes, that will clear the harbor, and will protect us against the incoming of a foreign enemy."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. PERKINS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has attracted my attention by mentioning quite a list of inventions made for the Army. Can the Senator tell me how much the Government has spent on the Gathmann gun, that came to us with much stronger claims on the part of the inventors than this boat?

Mr. PERKINS. It expended $50,000.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But they had no guns ready.

Mr. PERKINS. There was no gun when we made the first appropriation.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I am not mistaken. There was a gun later on.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes. The Government paid for it.

Mr. GALLINGER. A very large amount of money was expended on tests, and it proved a complete failure.

Mr. PERKINS. The Government paid for it. That is why I am commending this company. They ask you nothing to build this boat.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. Gathmann made me almost crazy in my committee room telling me what marvelous things this gun would do, and I was inclined to believe every word he said, just as some Senators seem to believe every word Mr. Lake says about his boat.

Mr. PERKINS. I share very much in my friend's feeling in that respect. I became baldheaded by his solicitations.

Mr. GALLINGER. And now has this Lake Torpedo Boat Company done anything more, so far as the Senator's committee is concerned, than to demonstrate the marvelous exploits of this boat on a mahogany or oak table?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, they built the boat. The Secretary of War detailed a board of experts, eminent men who have a national reputation as military officers, and their report is here.

Mr. WARREN. I have it here.

Mr. PERKINS. My friend from Wyoming has it and will give you the result of their report. My friend from Connecticut states that the boat is tied up at Newport or some other port in Connecticut or Rhode Island, and is there to be seen. It is all ready for operation. But the others who have importuned us came and said: "We want an appropriation first. We want so much money down for thorite powder, so much for Maxim powder, so much for jovite powder; we want so much to buy stock and materials; we want to buy a machine shop; we want the Government to appropriate this money to enable us to buy the machinery, to buy the material, and then we will show you what we can demonstrate."

Mr. GALLINGER. Once more, and I promise the Senator not to interrupt him again. I remember that some of the distinguished members of the Committee on Military Affairs told us and told the country of the wonderful merits of the Isham shell, and the Government spent a good deal of money on that invention. Has not that proved a failure, notwithstanding the profound impression the inventor made on some Senatorial minds?

Mr. PERKINS. There is no question of it, Mr. President. I say this is so refreshing because we have here something the utility of which has already been demonstrated. The others were a theory. These people have solved the problem.

Now, one word more. I refer again to the four boats which are being built for the Torpedo School of Submarine Mines by the Secretary of War.

Mr. CLAY. Before we get to that I should like to know if there is any recommendation from the War Department in regard to the purchase of this boat?

Mr. PERKINS. I stated this morning that Lieutenant-General Chaffee, Chief of Staff, and the board that was first appointed recommended to the War Department to procure five boats. The General wrote to the Secretary of War, recommending the purchase of one boat for the War Department, and the present Secretary of War transmitted that report to Congress without expressing any opinion.

Mr. CLAY. Then the Secretary of War has made no recommendation himself?

Mr. PERKINS. None. He has merely transmitted the report to Congress. He had only taken his office a few days or a week before and had not had an opportunity of going into the matter. He therefore transmitted to Congress the letter of General Chaffee, which the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] now has, as I passed it to him.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOPKINS in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. MALLORY. I have not heard the remarks of the Senator from California; but I should like to inquire what is the function of the board which has been referred to in connection with the Army?

Mr. PERKINS. As the Senator is well aware, the Army Engineer Corps has charge of the defenses of ports by the emplacement of guns, the Ordnance Department emplacing those guns, and the Engineer Department has charge of submarine mines. That has been the case in the James River and the harbors of New York, Baltimore, and Philadelphia, and others on our coast. The Senator from Connecticut has the memorandum, and I will ask him to read it, if he pleases, for the information of the Senate.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I have a memorandum, which was handed to me by General Chaffee, of the inspection of this boat by a board of three artillery officers. It is somewhat long, but I should like to read it for the benefit of those Senators who are interested, or appear to be interested, in this discussion, and who, I think, have not fully understood the subject:

THIRD DIVISION GENERAL STAFF,
Washington, February 25, 1904.

Memorandum report on the Lake submarine torpedo boats.

1. A board of three artillery officers was appointed by Special Orders, No. 20, Headquarters of the Army, January 24, 1903, to convene at Bridgeport, Conn., on January 26, 1903, to witness and report upon the test of the submarine torpedo boat Protector, built by the Lake Topedo Boat Company, of New York.

The boat was not put in readiness for a satisfactory test until January 15, 1904, and the board on January 20, 1904, visited the boat and remained on board from 10.15 a. m. to 4 p. m. From 12 m. to 3 p. m. the boat was submerged. From 12.40 to 2 p. m. the board was in the diving compartment observing the method of grappling for a cable.

No discomfort was experienced under the air pressure in the diving chamber. The other part of the interior was as comfortable as a surface boat of the same size would have been. Lunch was cooked and served to the party while submerged.

2. This boat is the invention of an American and was built by an American company. It has three very important features, viz:

(1) The capability of attaining complete submergence on an even keel by means of hydroplanes. This permits of great stability fore and aft and affords a ready control of the degree of submergence, as well as being most favorable to the use of the omniscope, to say nothing of increased safety.

(2) The ability to move about on the sea bottom at a depth as great as 150 feet.

(3) The possession of a diving chamber which permits a diver to be sent out for any desired submarine work, as grappling cables, inspecting mines and their connections, etc. It also affords a safe means of escape for the crew.

These features are believed to give this boat a superiority over the Holland boats, another American type, of which the Navy has seven. There is no doubt that boats of the Lake type can do all that the Holland boats can and be used in addition for mining, countermining, cutting cables, repairing juncture boxes, and other work on the harbor bottom.

3. The boat is driven, when partially submerged, by gasoline engines; when entirely submerged, by electric motors. This is believed to be the best system of motors now available.

The boat is fitted for discharging Whitehead torpedoes, there being two bow and one stern tube, each carrying a torpedo. Two spare ones may be taken in addition.

She is 67½ feet long, with 14 feet 2 inches extreme beam; draft in light cruising condition, 11 feet 9½ inches; displacement, light, 136.3 tons; speed, light condition, under engines, 9 knots; completely submerged, motors, 6 to 7 knots; cruising radius, about 350 knots, at full speed in light condition, with present gasoline-tank capacity; submerged radius with motors, about 20 knots, full speed. She has twin screws, operated by 2 gas engines, each of 120 horsepower. Using the engines and electric motor together for propulsion 324 horsepower may be developed for higher speed.

She was handled by a crew of trained men, who are not necessarily sailors, except the helmsman, who should be a good seaman, viz: One navigator and diver, 1 chief engineer, 1 assistant engineer, 1 electrician, 1 machinist, 1 deck hand, 1 cook; total, 7.

For fuller details see print, Appendix C, and paper by Lieutenant Halligan, United States Navy, Appendix D, with report of Army board. Also see album of photographs accompanying this memorandum, marked "Appendix A," submitted to this division by Mr. Lake, and explained by him in person February 19, 1904.

4. A careful study of the proceedings of the board and the above-mentioned appendixes shows that in boats of this type, fully developed by further experiment, we should have an exceedingly valuable adjunct, both for the attack and defense, whether from the point of view of a fleet commander or from the standpoint of the commander of the land forces protecting a large harbor.

The possible uses of a submarine boat of the Lake type may be summarized as follows:

FOR THE DEFENSE.

A valuble adjunct to the fixed-mine defense—

(a) As a substitute for fixed mines in those channels where extreme width, deep water, swift currents, or a combination of these difficulties make it impossible to use fixed mines effectively. In such cases these boats can lie in a favorable position for attacking at effective range with their Whitehead torpedoes any vessel attempting to reduce the forts or run past.

(b) As a supplement to the mines by attacking vessels approaching them, or which have passed them, they would be useful in preventing countermining.

(c) As scouts or pickets outside the mine fields keeping up telephonic communication with the shore.

(d) As a means of picking up and repairing defective cable joints, juncture boxes, etc., because of great facility for maneuvering on the bottom and sending out divers.

FOR THE ATTACK.

A superior means of attacking mine fields—

(a) Can run by any mine field as at present installed with little danger, and attack at pleasure any vessels in the harbor.

(b) Can maneuver on the bottom and grapple, raise, and cut mine or other cables, sending out a diver when necessary.

(c) Two submerged boats, connected by a light cable long enough to extend across all or part of a mine field, afford an efficient means of locating and cutting the cables of buoyant torpedoes.

5. Taking a purely military standpoint, it should be remembered that the experiments of Whitehead torpedoes fired from tubes on shore is receiving consideration, but that wide channels and swift currents, wherever they occur, will greatly limit this use of the Whitehead.

Boats of the Protector type could, however, in all such cases bring the torpedoes within effective range. They could be used to great advantage at the following points, viz: The eastern entrance to Long Island Sound, the entrance to Chesapeake Bay, San Francisco Harbor, Puget Sound, approaches to Pensacola Harbor, Manila Bay, and many others. There is no doubt whatever that boats of the Protector type would be a most valuable adjunct to harbor defense from an army standpoint.

6. Taking a naval standpoint, it is evident that if a fleet were provided with a torpedo transport capable of being used as a base for boats of this type, and able to convoy them within striking range of a hostile fleet or a mined harbor, that all the uses named under "Attack" would come into play, especially the ability to countermine; or if obliged to take the defensive, a fleet so provided could utilize them as suggested under that head.

7. From what has been said it is evident that the Navy must take up and develop boats of this type for the purposes mentioned.

It is known that the Protector is about to be tested by a naval board as soon as the weather permits, and her merits and demerits determined practically. These experiments may show that the type of boat suitable for use with a fleet will answer also for harbor defense. Boats of the Lake type, if built upon a larger scale than the Protector, would doubtless be able to cruise anywhere the usual type of torpedo boat may be expected to go, but for the uses mentioned the Protector type, perfected, seems best.

8. Harbors of the types mentioned above would be "submarine-torpedo stations," where the torpedo transports and submarines would be habitually kept. There should be on hand a sufficient number for use in the defense of the harbor in addition to those needed by the Navy.

In time of war the Navy would be called on to furnish those needed as adjuncts to the harbor defense. If one be needed for work in conjunction with a mine field, it must be assigned to duty under the officer in charge of that field.

9. The submarine boat bids fair to be so important an adjunct to submarine mining that if it be not taken up definitely by the Navy it must be by the Army; but before steps to secure such boats by the latter, the results of the complete tests shortly to be made by the Navy on boats of the Holland and Lake types should be carefully studied and the advice of naval experts sought.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

(10) It is therefore recommended that the subject of submarine torpedo boats be referred to the joint army and navy board for discussion, with a view to settling definitely the important question whether the service of these craft be placed wholly in the hands of the Navy or not.

The recommendation by the army board that five boats of the Protector type be at once procured for the use of the Army in submarine defense is not concurred in for the above reasons.

This report was considered and adopted by the third division in full committee.

ARTHUR L. WAGNER,
Colonel, General Staff; Chief Third Division.

General Chaffee, having had this report, writes that he does not recommend the purchase of five boats, but does recommend the purchase of one boat for experimental work in connection with the Submarine School of Mines.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. MALLORY. Is that paper a report from a board of army officers?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The report from the board of army officers is more lengthy.

Mr. MALLORY. Who is it that furnishes this information?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. General Chaffee sent that to me as being the memorandum of the report of a board of army officers submitted to the Third General Staff of the Army.

Mr. MALLORY. Then it comes from General Chaffee, the Commander of the Army, to the Senate?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It does. The report of the board which examined these boats was inserted in the RECORD when the matter was under consideration in the other House, and can be inserted here, if desired. It is too long, perhaps, to read.

Mr. MALLORY. I understand, Mr. President, that the naval appropriation bill contains a provision for the purchase of certain boats of this class, without specification as to the particular type of boat that is to be bought, leaving it to the judgment of the Navy Department to determine what particular type shall be selected. The point with me is whether we have sufficient information as to the character of these boats to justify us in purchasing them for the purpose which is here indicated. I do not think there is any doubt that a boat of that kind, if she is the boat that is indicated by this memorandum, is desirable for army purposes, but without any data than merely the report of the board, not made especially with a view of selecting this boat for that particular purpose, are we justified in making the appropriation required by this amendment?

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. MARTIN. I do not wish the floor if I am interfering with any other Senator. I thought other Senators were through.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I interrupted the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. PERKINS. That is all right.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I am not through with what I should like to say upon this subject, but I interrupted the Senator from California to read the memorandum of the report of the board of army officers who examined this boat. I may as well, perhaps, say what else I have to say on the matter now as at any other time.

It is very difficult, Mr. President, to understand the opposition to this amendment. The Chief of Staff, General Chaffee, wants one of these boats for use by the Submarine School of Mines. The Military Committee approves of that, as has been shown here on the floor of the Senate to-day; the Appropriations Committee approves of it, and has put a provision in the bill for that purpose.

I think I may say, without going outside of what is proper, that this provision is opposed by the Holland Torpedo Boat Company, who, I think, have sent a protest against it to every member of the Senate, and who have taken the opportunity to criticise the board of army officers which recommended it. As I understand, it is opposed by some members of the Naval Committee upon the ground that the Army ought not to have any of these boats, and if any of them are to be purchased, they ought to be under the control of the Navy.

I am not going into the question of the objections to this appropriation by the Holland company. We treated the Holland company pretty well. We appropriated to enable them to build their boats in the first instance. They had plans here and nothing else. They came to Congress, and we furnished them the money, as I understand it. If I am not correct, the chairman of the committee will correct me, but I understand that in the first place we furnished the money for that company to build their first boats.

Mr. CULLOM. Before any test.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Before any test; before a boat was built; before a keel was laid. We had nothing before us but paper specifications.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I think that is a mistake. I think the Holland boat had made several voyages, and had made a considerable exhibit of itself upon our coast before there was any appropriation by Congress.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think not; but I will refer that to the chairman of the committee.

I was saying that I thought, in the first instance, we appropriated money to enable the Holland company to build one boat, when there was nothing but plans and specifications presented to Congress.

Mr. PERKINS. That is my recollection.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is my recollection about it. I think that is so.

Mr. PERKINS. The first appropriation for Holland boats was $200,000 in 1893. The history of appropriations for Holland submarine boats is as follows:

Act of March 3, 1893, authorized Plunger, which was contracted for March 13, 1895. Contract canceled April, 1900, and amount previously paid credited on new contract of November 19, 1900, and payment for new Plunger made out of appropriation of 1893—$200,000. Reference to present Plunger made in act of June 10, 1896.

Act of June 10, 1896, provided for construction of two Holland submarine boats at $175,000 each.

Act of March 3, 1899, provided for construction of two submarine boats of Holland type, similar to the Holland (amending act of June 10, 1896). One of these two was the Holland and was purchased—$150,000.

Act of June 7, 1900, provided for construction of five submarine torpedo boats of Holland type, and the Department, on August 25, 1900 (referring to acts of 1896, 1899, and 1900), contracted for Adder, Grampus, Moccasin, Pike, Porpoise, and Shark, at $170,000 each.

All except Plunger were paid for out of appropriations "Increase of the Navy—Construction and machinery."

Act of March 3, 1903, authorized the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to contract for or purchase subsurface or submarine torpedo boats, not exceeding $500,000, and provided for certain tests.

Mr. CULLOM. The first appropriation of $200,000 in 1893 was before any boat was built.

Mr. PERKINS. Before any boat was built or thought of being built, except on paper.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is my recollection, and I hardly think I can be mistaken about that.

I am not saying that the Holland company has not a good boat, but I am saying that I think Congress has done pretty well by them under all the circumstances. They were a long while in furnishing boats that were satisfactory. I know there were times when we felt that it was very doubtful whether they would furnish any satisfactory boats. We paid them $1,354,000—if those are the figures—for boats which they furnished to the Government, and we have got only seven such boats, making the cost per boat about $200,000, or nearly that. Really, Mr. President, it does not seem to me in good taste for the Holland company to come here and make this open opposition to the purchase of the Lake boat, which is provided for in this appropriation. I do not think I need say anything further than that.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. CARMACK. I should like to know what the Senator has reference to when he speaks of the Holland company making opposition. Is that company making any opposition?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. They have sent a circular; I can not say to every member of the Senate, but I know a great many members of the Senate have received a letter; I have one myself and I have seen a good many others, but I do not know that they have been sent to every Senator.

Mr. CARMACK. I have not seen one of them. I merely wanted to know to what the Senator referred.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. They object to the purchase of this boat, and then proceed to criticise the report of the army officers. It does not seem to me, Mr. President, that that is in good taste. I do not want to use any offensive term or talk about lobbying, but the opposition to this amendment comes from that quarter, and it comes from members of the Naval Committee, who think that the Army ought not to have this boat. As against that I think I may put the views of the army officers, the views of the Military Committee, and the views of the Appropriations Committee.

It is true, Mr. President, that the inventor of this boat was a Connecticut man—I think he is now—although the company for building it was organized, I think, under New York laws. So I have had some opportunity to know what has been going on. I think that the Protector is the third or fourth boat which they have built with their own money, without asking the Government to pay them a cent. They have now a boat which is so far perfected that a board of army officers makes the report upon it to which allusion has been made, and they come and ask the Government to purchase that boat.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] wishes to amend by striking out "$250,000" and inserting "$200,000." The amendment which I propose does not propose to purchase this boat absolutely, nor to fix any absolute price for it. I think the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], when he was discussing this matter, said that for himself he would be glad to leave it all to the Secretary of War. That is exactly what this amendment does, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I did not say that.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Pretty nearly that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator must have reference to a question I propounded after this wise: Would the Senator be willing to have substituted for the amendment in the bill the words that are in the naval appropriation bill, opening it to competition?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. No, Mr. President; what I alluded to was this: The Senator at the close of his remarks said, as I remember—

I will say in closing that the Secretary of War has not asked for this, and the Secretary of the Navy has not asked for it; but, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to leave the whole matter in the hands of the Secretary of War.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is absolutely right; and I will say to the Senator that, if this matter could be referred to the Secretary of War, I should be very much inclined to yield to his judgment in the matter; although I still think it would be bad policy to divide the Navy, giving part of it to the Navy Department and part of it to the War Department.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not see what more this amendment does than to refer the whole matter to the Secretary of War. It puts it in his discretion to decide whether or not he shall purchase the boat at all, and it puts it in his discretion whether he is to pay $250,000 or a less sum, if he does purchase it. I can not for the life of me, as I said, see really why all this opposition comes to this amendment.

I do not know that I desire to occupy more of the time of the Senate. This matter has occupied a good deal of time; but I do think that the ground taken here that if this boat is to be purchased at all it ought to be under the Navy Department, and that the Army, having charge of the coast defenses, ought not to be permitted to have such a boat, is not tenable. This whole matter of coast defenses is under the Army. If the Secretary of War finds that this boat is valuable for harbor defense, I do not know why the Army should not be permitted to have such a boat.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator a question before he sits down?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Who is to command this boat—an officer of the Army?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It will be in charge of whoever has charge of the School of Submarine Mines.

Mr. LODGE. Then the boat is to be under the command of an army officer?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not know.

Mr. LODGE. Is it not necessarily so?

Mr. PROCTOR. No; of course not.

Mr. LODGE. Then is it to be under the command of a naval officer?

Mr. PROCTOR. The Army has many boats and a good many commanders. The boats are not commanded by naval officers, but they have good seamen, ship captains, to command them.

Mr. LODGE. Then they would employ somebody outside of the Army to command these boats?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think it would be entirely proper to do so.

Mr. LODGE. They would employ somebody outside of the Army to command this boat?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think it would be entirely proper to operate it in that way, though it might be necessary to have in command either an officer of the Army or the Navy. I do not know much about that, Mr. President. One of the mysterious things I have never been able to solve since I have been a Senator is the organization of the Army and the organization of the Navy. It is something that is entirely beyond my comprehension. I have tried to understand something of the organization of the Army and Navy, but in some way my mind does not grasp it.

I am confused the moment I talk about the organization of the Army or the Navy, and I envy those Senators who seem to have at their tongue's end everything relating to the organization of those departments.

But if I understand the matter—and I am not sure whether I do or not—there is a School of Submarine Mines, is there not?

Mr. PROCTOR. Yes.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. And that is under the charge of the Army?

Mr. PROCTOR. Yes.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I suppose that whoever is in charge of that School of Submarine Mines will, with the assent of his superiors, find some way of operating this boat if it is purchased. I do not care very much how it is operated, whether by an officer of the Army or the Navy, or an old sea salt, who knows how to run and operate such a boat.

Mr. PROCTOR. It would be a very simple matter indeed, I think. Of course there would be a man, an expert in handling this particular boat, in charge, so far as seamanship is concerned, and an army officer would be on board with general direction as to what torpedoes should be taken up, what lines examined, etc. There is no difficulty whatever about the administration.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] seemed disposed to treat this matter as a controversy between the Lake company and the Holland company. It seems to me that is a very extraordinary view to take of a proposition of this sort. I hardly reckon there is a Senator on this floor who knows about any controversy between those companies. I know no such controversy, and if there is such a controversy I care nothing about it. I take it for granted every Senator here feels that his duty is to look after the interests of the country and to do what is best in behalf of the defense of the country.

Nobody questions the importance of a torpedo boat in naval warfare. The recent events in the East, in the conflict between Japan and Russia, have brought conspicuously to the notice of the world the great importance of the torpedo boat. I can not, however, fail to comment on the suggestion made by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] that the submarine boat had played an important part in the conflict in the East. It is well known that Japan has not a single submarine boat in its service.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. MARTIN. And there is no use to try to hurry through the Senate a new departure like this on any idea that there is something phenomenal and something unusual brought to our attention by the conflict in the East. It may be that the Japanese have cooked on our submarine boats, but I hardly think there is a Senator here who believes they have carried back to Japan knowledge of submarine-boat construction and have introduced that. The name of every torpedo boat in the Japanese navy is known at the Intelligence Office of our Navy Department and at the intelligence department of every other important government in the world. There have been no submarine boats in that conflict up to this time.

I do not mean, however, to minimize the importance of the submarine boat. It is attracting the attention of all the governments of the world. France has a great number of them. England has some of them. All are investigating this subject and using for that investigation their best agencies in the respective governments. It is not a new question with our Government. It is true it is new to the War Department; it is true it is new with General Chaffee; but it is not new with the Navy Department. Our Navy Department has had its best experts studying the problem of submarine boats for years. They have made elaborate investigations for years and we have had elaborate reports from the Navy Department; and it seems to me if we are going to take up this question as the other governments are taking it up, we should take it up by our best-equipped Department and place it in the hands of our most skilled experts.

It can hardly be contended that the Army is better qualified to investigate and determine questions of this sort than the Navy Department. I feel that we have in the Navy Department a man whose fidelity and whose ability are beyond question, whose patriotism is beyond possible question, whose devotion to the welfare of the country and to the development of the Navy is second to that of no one within the limits of our country. He has had his trained experts, his trained officers, who have devoted their lives to the investigation of questions of this sort. I respectfully submit that it is bad business policy, it is bad legislative policy to withdraw from that Department a question which it has had under consideration for years, and to turn it over to a new Department not versed in marine subjects at all.

It is true that the coast defenses are closely allied to the torpedo boat, but General Chaffee, in the report which he has made and which has been read by the Senator from Connecticut, points out the way by which the torpedo boat can be fully utilized for the defense of our harbors under military officers. It is not pretended that our cadets at West Point are trained or educated in the art and science of navigating ships. It is not pretended that a graduate from West Point would be qualified in the remotest degree to take charge of one of these vessels. The Navy Department has men qualified and ready at any moment to take charge of them. The training at Annapolis is for that purpose. I can conceive of no reason whatever for taking these boats away from seafaring men, men who are educated in the ways of the sea and in the ways of ships, and turning them over to men who have no knowledge whatever of the subject.

It is especially remarkable and incomprehensible to my mind that this proposition should be presented here now, when in the naval bill we have already appropriated $850,000 for the purchase of boats like these if the Navy Department thinks they ought to be bought. This would make a million one hundred thousand dollars. We hear a good deal of talk about extravagant appropriations, about the immense expenses that are being imposed upon the people year by year in our great appropriation bills. This latitudinarian talk amounts to very little. The only way you can keep down appropriations is to single out an item in an appropriation bill that is wrong and strike it out. Here is an item of $250,000 that I do not feel is justified.

It is said by the Senator from Connecticut that the Military Affairs Committee is in favor of the amendment. I do not know how he finds it out. The Military Affairs Committee have made no report on this bill. The Coast Defense Committee has made no report on this bill. The only report that comes to the Senate to guide it in its consideration of the question comes from the Committee on Appropriations, and I respectfully submit that it needs the investigation of some other body, a committee especially organized for considering questions of this sort.

Mr. BERRY. The Appropriations Committee was not unanimous, either.

Mr. MARTIN. The Senator from Arkansas says the committee was by no means unanimous. I do not know. It is here as a committee report and entitled to the consideration which belongs to a report of one of the great committees of the Senate.

But I do not think we can lug into this discussion the Military Affairs Committee or the Coast Defense Committee and be brought to a conclusion one way or the other on account of the views which may be entertained by either of those committees, because neither of those committees has considered this proposition or made a report on it. The only report we have is the report of the Committee on Appropriations.

I feel, Mr. President, that this is an extravagant and useless appropriation. We have a provision in the naval bill which authorizes the purchase of this very boat if the Secretary of the Navy thinks it wise to purchase it. He can purchase more than one of them. He can purchase ships of any other pattern as well as the Lake pattern. He can purchase up to $850,000 worth; and it is not a new provision. The amount is increased in this bill, but there was a large amount—I think $500,000—in the naval appropriation bill passed at the last session of Congress, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to take up this matter and purchase submarine boats if he saw fit to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. After competitive trials.

Mr. MARTIN. After competitive trials.

Mr. CARMACK. Will the Senator from Virginia permit me?

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. In the report of Colonel Wagner, from which the Senator from Connecticut read, it is said:

> 7. From what has been said, it is evident that the Navy must take up and develop boats of this type for the purposes mentioned.
> It is known that the Protector is about to be tested by a naval board as soon as the weather permits, and her merits and demerits determined practically.

Mr. WARREN. I can not hear the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Reread it.

Mr. CARMACK. I am reading from the report:

> 7. From what has been said it is evident that the Navy must take up and develop boats of this type for the purposes mentioned.
> It is known that the Protector is about to be tested by a naval board as soon as the weather permits and her merits and demerits determined practically. These experiments may show that the type of boat suitable for use with a fleet will answer also for harbor defense.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if that is from the board of army officers?

Mr. CARMACK. It is from Colonel Wagner, I believe. It is the paper from which the Senator from Connecticut was reading a while ago.

Mr. MARTIN. That covers what I have stated—that this matter is under investigation by the Navy Department. I do not mean it offensively or disrespectfully, and I do not know that it is so intended, but in effect you can not—but in effect and in substance this is an anticipation of the action of the Navy Department, by specific legislation in favor of a particular company for a particular boat. It should be investigated and is being investigated by the Navy Department in connection with all other boats, and that investigation ought to be full and complete. We have given full and ample authority to the Navy Department to make the investigation and to act on the conclusion which may be arrived at by that Department.

I say we should not anticipate that investigation. We should not anticipate the action about to be taken by the Navy Department. We should wait. There is no reason for this haste. This is special legislation for a particular boat, and we are without the information to guide us intelligently; at least, I am. I do not mean to disparage this boat. I have no doubt it is a great invention. It may be very useful in the future history of the country, and I have no doubt all the utility it possesses will be carefully investigated and will be carefully availed of by the Navy Department under existing legislation. This is an attempt to anticipate an investigation which we have ordered, and is an attempt to take from the properly constituted authorities of the Government the jurisdiction which they should exercise.

This matter is peculiarly and especially within the province of the Navy Department, and the Navy Department should be permitted to investigate it and to dispose of it. This appropriation, if made at this time, I say, will be premature. It is not wise; and if we want to keep down appropriations, we can do it only by striking out items which are not absolutely necessary. Items should not be put in until after the most careful investigation. We have not the information that can lead us to conclude that this is necessary or wise, and I think the whole amendment should be stricken out.

Mr. WARREN and Mr. CARMACK addressed the Chair.

Mr. CARMACK. Will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me that I may introduce an amendment?

Mr. WARREN. I have not yet obtained the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an amendment now pending.

Mr. CARMACK. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I rise to address myself to the amendment to the amendment now before the Senate, which, I understand, is to strike out the words "and fifty," so that the boat may have an appropriation of two hundred instead of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. But before proceeding on that line I wish it understood that I have nothing to say against the Holland boat.

It is a little funny, however, to review the case and to remember that our able Naval Committee, who have jealously guarded our interests for so many years, bought the Holland boat by name and by a specific appropriation and without competition through competitive bids.

Mr. PERKINS. And nine of them.

Mr. WARREN. Nine of them, and the first one was provided for when there was nothing but a few pencil lines on paper to show for a boat or to assure us that such a boat when done would be useful, and $200,000 was appropriated for it.

Mr. GALLINGER. But, if the Senator will permit me, the Holland boat was bought when there was no other type on the market.

Mr. WARREN. And there is no other type yet on the market of the boat now under consideration——

Mr. GALLINGER. That is disputed.

Mr. WARREN. Not for the purpose for which this boat is wanted. I believe that the committee which has recommended this amendment has given it sufficient consideration so that it may say, with as much confidence as the Naval Committee did in the other instance, that there is no boat that competes with it. The boy who climbs to the top of the ladder placed on the back of his comrades, and then kicks the ladder over, so that his comrades can not climb up or get in, is not always a favorite in the society of good boys.

Whether the solicitude on the part of the members of the Naval Committee of the Government's rights and the protection that should be afforded through competition comes from a new light—a sort of reform movement—or because they are sorry they bought those Holland submarine boats, or whether it is because they wish some other committee to have less privileges than they have enjoyed, I can not say. But I view it in a light something like this.

Coming back to the amendment under discussion, we have here in this Lake submarine boat something that has been tried sufficiently to demonstrate that it has sufficient merit to attract the attention of the United States Government, and so far we have paid nothing for or toward the invention.

This proposition comes in here reported from a committee which ever since I have been a member of the Senate has yearly considered the appropriation of various amounts for projected schemes or patents to improve our modes of warfare and our utensils of warfare. We have been paying for this, for that, and for the other.

It has been stated by one of the Senators opposed to the present amendment—I think the Senator from New Hampshire—that we injudiciously spent money for the Gathmann gun. I will remind him that we had an opportunity once to buy for a small sum, if I am correctly informed, the patent for the Maxim gun.

We failed to buy it, and we have been paying for it perhaps several thousandfold since in the royalty paid on the guns we have bought, which were manufactured in another country and by another people, because we were not liberal enough to compensate our own inventors for their skill and the money which they had spent in their researches.

Now, as to whether this shall be $250,000 or $200,000 I have just this to say: This boat differs from the Holland boat in this respect: It has two complete sets of machinery—its engines, its tanks, its fuel arrangements, and its electric machinery. In other words, it takes only one set to do everything that is required of the boat where there is no accident, but in case of accident it has another set of machinery all ready to be put in motion. In that it differs from the Holland boat. It is a larger boat. It is a boat that can move on the bottom of the ocean, in the bay, and it can move without being propelled through the water in the usual way. It can proceed on creepers, if I may call them such, upon the ground. Then it can be opened at the bottom and divers can go out and come in. In that respect it differs from the Holland boat, and it is for a different purpose.

I dare say the Secretary of War may procure a boat for $200,000; but the inventors propose, if they get the approval of the Secretary of War, to build a larger boat than this, and to build it, as I say, with two sets of machinery throughout. The amendment provides, first, that it shall be within the discretion of the Secretary of War whether he shall authorize the purchase of the boat at all; second, it shall be in his discretion what he shall pay for the boat, not exceeding $250,000. And it seems to me we ought to give to him the limit we have made—$250,000.

Now, I believe we can afford as a nation, when something of value has been invented for which we have expended nothing, to be reasonably and decently generous in the purchase of a first-product sample. It seems to me we should in some way encourage invention.

We should encourage it along lines where we desire articles for defense that are of such large cost, and being used only by the Government, that an inventor is not justified in spending either his money or his time on them, unless there shall be something in the way of a price for his patent or a liberal price for a certain number or quantity of his product.

If we were further along with this Lake patent and had bought, say, this one boat, and, having tried it, knew exactly what it amounts to, and gentlemen wished to put it to competition, it would be all right. But there certainly can not be any large sum between what this boat will actually cost and $250,000, which will be paid as a bonus or for the patent or for its use or to encourage the inventor.

As set forth, this boat is for the use of the School of Submarine Defense and in connection with the submarine mines. I am not going to take up the question whether or not this belongs to the Navy Department, except to say that it belongs where the submarine mines are, whether it be in the Navy or the Army, and this submarine work is now in the Army; and when you talk about going to the Navy for sailors or for men in charge of such a boat, the absurdity of it is obvious on its face.

It does not matter whether it is under the Army or the Navy, there must be those, whether from Army or Navy or civil life, who are able to take and run this boat, who have been educated for the special purpose. This boat in its submarine-mine work will doubtless be in the general charge of the Engineer Corps, and there will be enough men interested in the success and building of the boat and sufficiently used to it, and having had sufficient experience with it, to be placed at the disposal of the Engineer Corps to supply all the expert skill necessary.

Mr. CARMACK. Will the Senator inform me who will be in command of this vessel? Will it be in command of a naval officer?

Mr. WARREN. It will be under the command of the Army, probably in the Engineering Corps, so long as it is used in connection with submarine mines.

Mr. CARMACK. I mean the man who is to be immediately in charge of this vessel. Will he be a naval officer or an army officer?

Mr. WARREN. He will be an army officer.

Mr. CARMACK. He will?

Mr. WARREN. He will be sent from the Army. He will be in command. You might say the same as to our transports or our ferries. You might say the same as to the revenue cutters under the Treasury Department.

Mr. CARMACK. Are there marine engineers in the Army?

Mr. WARREN. I presume the Navy has an engineer corps the same as the Army has. I might ask the Senator if the submarine mines are in charge of the engineers of the Navy?

Mr. CARMACK. There will have to be marine engineers in charge of this boat?

Mr. WARREN. Why so?

Mr. CARMACK. I was asking for information.

Mr. WARREN. I do not so regard it.

Mr. LODGE. A submarine mine is not exactly the same as a boat.

Mr. WARREN. We understand that; but in the sense in which this boat is proposed to be used it becomes an instrument—a tool or implement, if you will—with reference to laying and handling and taking up mines. That you may go further and use it for other purposes is true; but that makes the boat no less valuable; no less useful. On the other hand, it makes it all the more valuable.

I want to say to the Senator from Massachusetts with regard to the assertion he made that submarine mines were placed before we had submarine boats, that he is correct. It is also true that wars were fought long before we had battle ships, and, perhaps, before we had ships at all. But that is no argument to prove that it is not necessary to move along with the times and to keep somewhere up to date as compared with the other great nations.

Mr. LODGE. I understood the Senator to say that this boat will be managed by army engineers. The Senator is familiar with the education of army engineers. Are they engineers in the sense that naval engineers are—persons familiar with machinery, mechanicians?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. LODGE. I understood the Senator to say that the boat would be in charge of an army engineer.

Mr. WARREN. I simply said that the mines——

Mr. LODGE. I am speaking about the boat, not the mines.

Mr. WARREN. I said the mines are under the engineering department of the Army. I said nothing about an engineer in charge of the boat.

Mr. LODGE. I so understood the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. No, sir.

Mr. LODGE. I thought the Senator said an army officer would be in charge of the boat.

Mr. WARREN. Yes, sir; as to general charge of it; but I take it there will be some one in direct charge who will be able to run it, just as there are with the hundreds of craft now used under the Army and under the Treasury Department in the Revenue-Cutter Service.

Mr. LODGE. Are they navigated by army officers?

Mr. WARREN. Are all the naval vessels navigated by naval officers?

Mr. LODGE. They are. On an army boat they have men from the merchant marine; but the naval officers would navigate it themselves, if the Navy had the vessel.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator proves by his own remark that it will not be necessary to call on the Navy to run the vessel.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no. The Army can employ officers from the merchant marine to run its vessels. Everybody knows that.

Mr. WARREN. Suppose the Navy should take up this matter and should purchase this boat. Do Senators contend that it would be handled by the Navy Department and not turned over to the Army for the use of its Engineering Department with respect to these mines?

Mr. LODGE. I contend that the boat itself would be managed by naval officers, and I contend further that in warlike operations it would be under the direction of the admiral of the fleet and not of a general on shore.

Mr. WARREN. Are the submarine mines in charge of the admiral of the fleet?

Mr. LODGE. The mines are fixed and not movable.

Mr. WARREN. On the contrary, they are in many cases not fixed, and are movable. They may be put down to-day and taken up to-morrow or next week.

Mr. LODGE. I mean that this boat is intended to be used as a scout and to attack the enemy's fleet.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator has gotten further than we have. We are trying to purchase the boat.

Mr. LODGE. I am quoting from the report of the military board.

Mr. WARREN. That is one of the things that may be done.

Mr. LODGE. That report can not be authority for one and not for the other.

Mr. WARREN. But the boat is not asked for by the Army and the Lieutenant-General upon that aspect of the case alone. That it may be put to the same use as another boat for strictly war purposes does not detract from it.

Now, I want to say again that the latest information we have from the wars in the world and from the foremost officer of our Navy is that we ought to have more rather than less torpedo and submarine craft.

If we have appropriated $850,000 in the naval bill and we appropriate $250,000 more, which makes $1,100,000 altogether, is it not just as well to put $1,100,000 all told into lesser craft and more in number, which, even when working only on the surface of the sea, have proved their ability in foreign waters to cripple and put out of business ships worth three or four or five million dollars apiece?

Are we going to continue to build ships worth millions of dollars each when some other power may expend a little money on boats costing from one hundred and fifty to two hundred and fifty thousand dollars each, and any one of which may alone, almost in the twinkling of an eye, render the larger battle ship useless? Are we to neglect our harbors?

Ought not we to invest in everything the merit of which is sufficiently proven so that we can feel we can take the slight chances of a small investment like this one in order to improve our defenses?

Why, Mr. President, with a half million or a million dollars invested in these submarine craft and appliances any fleet—a fleet costing fifty times as much, indeed—could be kept from successfully entering one of our principal harbors.

The $5,000,000 battle ship is powerless to locate or resist the boat under water; and the great war machine is helpless in an attempted defense against the quick-moving, shark-like, dangerous little enemy which, with its telephone and telegraph connection with shore, keeps fully informed and yet gives no surface sign of its location, while it can pierce through the most vulnerable points into the very vitals of a floating craft.

All this in addition to its functions as diving bell and repair boat for submarine mining.

Now, here is a plain proposition. It takes nothing away from the Navy. It simply adds to the total expenditure of the United States a possible $250,000, if the Secretary of War, upon consideration, deems it proper.

That sum will provide an instrument for the use of the Army where it has nothing to-day for that same use, and where it will remain, and where it would have to go if it were built for the Navy and detailed to the Army for its use.

As to the amendment to the amendment, on which I rose more especially to speak, we have left it all to the discretion of the Secretary of War as to whether to purchase the boat or not, and as to the price to be paid.

In reference to the matter of difference in possible cost, whether the boat shall be larger or smaller, with a single or a double set of machinery, it is better to vote the whole amount than to reduce it to $200,000 and possibly get an inferior boat.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the Senator, before he takes his seat, tell me on what basis this appropriation of $250,000 was fixed? What information has the Senator on the point?

Mr. WARREN. The builders of the boat have estimated that they can build, at a cost to themselves of $250,000, a boat that shall be larger than the Protector and that shall contain everything which that boat contained and more, with, as I said before, a double set of machinery.

Mr. MALLORY. Is that information before the committee of the Senate?

Mr. WARREN. It was before the Committee on Appropriations, and the gentleman who invented and built the Protector was himself before the committee. Let me say right along that line that perhaps the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] overlooked the fact that the members of the Appropriations Committee are also members of the Military Committee and members of the Coast Defenses Committee.

In fact, barring some of the younger Senators, and I flatter myself sometimes by terming myself one of the younger, there are men upon the Appropriations Committee who have served upon a very great many of the committees of the Senate in time past, and the most important committees.

The senior Senator in length of service upon the other side of the Chamber has served a very long time both upon the Military Committee and upon the Committee on Appropriations. His judgment is seldom and his industry and integrity never questioned by members on either side of this Chamber, and it may or may not be a significant fact that he is a very warm supporter and advocate of this particular amendment.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President, some Senators have argued this question, it seems to me, in a rather peculiar way. The argument has been advanced here that the Government has been exceedingly liberal and generous with respect to the Holland boat. Attention has been called to the fact that the Government itself furnished money for building the first Holland boat, when there were nothing but plans and specifications; and the plea is made that inasmuch as the Government has been so fair, so liberal, and so generous with respect to the Holland boat it now ought to do something nice with respect to the Lake torpedo boat.

Mr. President, I do not suppose that Congress in this matter is being governed or has been governed in the past by any idea of favoritism with respect to one boat or another. I do not suppose when Congress appropriated the money for the construction of the Holland boat that it was done for the purpose of conferring any favor upon the inventor of that boat. I suppose the Government did that because it was thought to be to the interest of the Government to do so, and we are not called upon to do anything particularly to favor the constructor or the inventor of this boat unless it is manifestly to the interest of the Government to do so. I am not at all interested in any conflict of interest which may have come up between the inventors of the Holland boat and the Lake torpedo boat. The question is to be considered entirely from the standpoint of the interest of the Government.

I say in the first place, Mr. President, this matter has no place in this bill. It is a matter that belongs or should belong exclusively in the naval appropriation bill. This is a naval vessel. It is a vessel built for naval purposes, for the purpose of naval attack and naval defense. It is purely a naval vessel, and you can not make it anything else. The fact that it will be used for coast defenses does not alter the character of the vessel.

Attention has been called to the fact that provision has been made for the construction of torpedo boats in the naval appropriation bill. The provision is as follows:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to contract for or purchase subsurface or submarine torpedo boats in the aggregate of, but not exceeding, $850,000.

In this statement from which the Senator from Connecticut read it is said:

From what has been said it is evident that the Navy must take up and develop boats of this type for the purposes mentioned.

It is known that the Protector is about to be tested by a naval board as soon as the weather permits and her merits and demerits determined practically. These experiments may show that the type of boat suitable for use with a fleet will answer also for harbor defense.

Now, while that matter is pending—when, as we are informed, the naval board is preparing to test this very boat and to determine whether or not it is suitable for harbor defense—why should we put a provision in this bill directing the Secretary of War to purchase a boat of this kind? Who ought to determine that question? Who ought to test the efficiency of this torpedo boat for the purposes contemplated in this bill? It ought to be done by the Navy Department.

What are the uses of this vessel? I find here in the statement from which the Senator from Connecticut read, among other things, the following:

(b) As a supplement to the mines, by attacking vessels approaching them or which have passed them, they would be useful in preventing countermining.

(c) As scouts or pickets outside the mine fields, keeping up telephonic communication with the shore.

(d) As a means of picking up and repairing defective cable joints, juncture boxes, etc., because of great facility for maneuvering on the bottom and sending out divers.

Again, it is said:

Taking a naval standpoint, it is evident that if a fleet were provided with a torpedo transport capable of being used as a base for boats of this type, and able to convoy them within a striking range of a hostile fleet, or a mined harbor, that all the uses named under "Attack" would come into play, especially the ability to countermine; or if obliged to take the defensive, a fleet so provided could utilize them as suggested under that head.

Then it is said here:

In time of war the Navy would be called on to furnish those needed as adjuncts to the harbor defense. If one be needed for work in conjunction with a mine field, it must be assigned to duty under the officer in charge of that field.

I say, Mr. President, this is a naval vessel, and wherever a vessel of the Navy is needed for the purposes contemplated in this act it can be assigned by the President to be used for that purpose. There is absolutely no necessity on earth, in my judgment, for any such provision in the bill, when we know that provision has already been made for the construction or the testing of torpedo boats, and that this very boat is soon to be tested by the Navy Department with the very view of determining whether or not it will suit the purposes contemplated in this act.

Mr. President, I will have an amendment read at the desk, which I propose to offer when it is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

In line 14, page 3, after the word "boat," strike out everything down to and including the word "company," in lines 15 and 16, and insert:

"Of such type as he may, after careful test and examination, approve."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, any Government boat or vessel that runs on water may be called a naval appliance, but the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] appears to think that that can only be done under the Navy Department. The Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] read a long list stating the number of boats the War Department has, showing that those boats and boats used in other Departments amount to several hundred, of which the Navy has no more control than it will have of this boat when the War Department shall use it.

Mr. CARMACK. Are they fighting vessels?

Mr. TELLER. The Senator wants to know whether they are fighting vessels. Mr. President, this is not a fighting vessel, unless you want to use it as such. It is a vessel for other purposes, if you need it, and it is in perfect accordance with the custom.

For instance, it is the custom for the different branches of the War Department to have vessels to carry out the purposes for which they were severally created. The Mississippi River Commission has boats that the Government has built and has bought. Then the Treasury Department runs a great number of boats as revenue cutters and all that. There is nothing extraordinary in the fact that the War Department shall have a vessel under its control. If Senators will look at the reports of the Government they will find that that is the custom in such cases.

I notice the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] stated he did not know anything about what the cost of this boat would be, and then he concluded that $200,000 would be ample. I agree with him that I do not think he did know much about it, and I do not pretend to know much about what it would cost. I never built a boat. But I think when you submit that question to the Secretary of War he will determine what the boat is to cost.

The Senator seemed quite disposed to think if we had the report of the Secretary of War on this boat, favoring it, he might be willing to support it. Mr. President, this whole question might be submitted to the Secretary of War, who I suppose knows no more about the building of boats and what a boat is worth or what it would cost than the Senator from Virginia or I. But he will find some one in his Department, where they are buying boats and building boats and using boats, who will know what this boat ought properly to cost, and if he is the right kind of a Secretary of War, as I think he is, he will determine in a proper way whether they are asking too much or not.

Now, Mr. President, this does not belong to the Navy Department. They have no right to lay a mine or to pick up a mine. If this boat is of any value for that purpose, it must be under the control and direction of the War Department, and it can not be under the direction of the Navy Department. I think if the Senators who assume that there is something remarkably strange about this matter will look into the actual practice of the Government, they will find that there is not anything strange or unusual about it.

Mr. MALLORY rose.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, if the Senator from California does not object, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I will withhold the motion if the Senator from Florida desires to speak.

Mr. MALLORY. I have only a very few remarks to make. I do not think I will consume five minutes.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not observe that the Senator had risen when I addressed the Chair.

Mr. PERKINS. If there is to be a roll call upon the amendment, I fear it may develop the fact that there is no quorum present. Therefore, if the Senator from Ohio desires an executive session, I will not object, but with the understanding that immediately after the routine morning business to-morrow the Senate will again proceed to consider the bill.

Mr. SCOTT. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], who, I understand, is entitled to the floor, is not here to go on to-day.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not expect to go on with the matter to which the Senator alludes. I want to go into executive session, however, that I may give a notice as to when I shall undertake to go on, and, if possible, induce the Senate to agree with me. I will withhold the motion until the Senator from Florida concludes.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I am inclined to think that if the points which have been referred to as being favorable to the adoption of this type of boats are sustained she is the very boat that is necessary for the purpose designated in the bill. I have no idea that you can detail a navy boat of this type to do the work for which an army boat is required in laying down and looking after stationary mines at the mouths of the ports of this country. I think anyone who is familiar with the subject will understand that if we can get such a boat as this where a man in a submarine suit can pass out of the boat and pick up a buried mine and replace it, if necessary, and look after the shore connections of the mine, and see that they are not clogged up by marine growth, which is a great source of trouble in tropical and semitropical waters, a boat of this character for fortification purposes, for defense purposes, pure and simple, would be very desirable; and I would be inclined to vote for the amendment were I satisfied that all these requirements were complied with.

So far as the question as to who shall command the boat is concerned, I think that is a mere matter of detail that should not be considered at all. The Army has always been able to find men adequate both in point of ability and in other respects to take charge of the boats which are under army control. The Army has many launches, where they have civilians who are selected because of their experience and capacity, and there is no complaint made about them at all. I do not think this boat would be any more difficult to manage than an ordinary steam launch, and under the supervision of an engineer of the Army, who necessarily would have to have control and supervision of such a boat, there would be no difficulty whatever, and I do not think it would be necessary to inquire as to whether we shall get an engineer from the Navy or a captain or a minor officer of the Navy to take command of it.

The point with me, however, Mr. President, is that the Senate has not yet sufficient information on this subject to act intelligently upon it. In the recommendation from Col. Arthur L. Wagner, General Staff, and Chief of the Third Division, who makes the report which was read by the Senator from Connecticut, there is the following statement:

> The submarine boat bids fair to be so important an adjunct to submarine mining that if it be not taken up definitely by the Navy, it must be by the Army; but before steps to secure such boats by the latter the results of the complete tests shortly to be made by the Navy on boats of the Holland and Lake types should be carefully studied and the advice of naval experts sought.

Now, there is a clear intimation to the Senate that it would be very desirable that we should go a little slow in this matter. In addition to that, I note that he makes the following recommendation:

> It is, therefore, recommended that the subject of submarine torpedo boats be referred to the joint army and navy board for discussion, with a view of settling definitely the important question whether the service of these craft be placed wholly in the hands of the Navy or not.

The little I personally know on this subject leads me to believe, as I have stated, that such a boat as this, connected with the harbor defense of each one of our great ports, is desirable, if the boat is what she is said to be; but I do not think that information here sufficiently definite has been elicited to justify me in supporting this measure. Had it been I would have no hesitation in voting for the amendment of the committee.

RECORDS OF REGISTERS AND RECEIVERS.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. FORAKER. I yield to that Senator.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5511) to authorize registers and receivers of United States land offices to furnish transcripts of their records to individuals. It is a very short bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that registers and receivers of United States land offices shall, in addition to the fees now allowed by law, be entitled to charge and receive for making transcripts of the records in their offices for individuals the sum of 10 cents per hundred words for each transcript so furnished; and the transcripts thus furnished, when duly certified to by them, shall be admitted as evidence in all courts of the United States and the Territories thereof, and before all officials authorized to receive evidence, with the same force and effect as the original records.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. FORAKER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 15, 1904, at 12 o'clock m.

CONFIRMATION.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

LIMIT OF TIME FOR PROSECUTION AGAINST OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that House bill 11815, together with the report thereon, be taken from the House Calendar and recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the following bill, the title of which the Clerk will report, be taken from the House Calendar and recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Clerk read as follows:

The bill (H. R. 11815) to limit the time within which prosecutions may be instituted against officers, agents, or employees of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SULZER. What is the title of the bill, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again read the title.

The Clerk again reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SULZER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have some information about this matter. Why should this bill be referred back to the committee?

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. I will say to the gentleman from New York that this request is made in order that the bill may be before the Committee on the Judiciary for the purpose of considering an amendment.

Mr. SULZER. An amendment proposed by whom?

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. I make the request by a vote of the Committee on the Judiciary, and, as I remember it, it was unanimous.

Mr. SULZER. Why can not the amendment be made in the House when the bill is brought up for consideration?

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. I think it is better that the bill should come before the House in such form as the committee may desire, and then if anyone desires to offer an amendment it can be considered under better circumstances than at the present time.

Mr. SULZER. Well, if the bill is to be speedily reported back to the House I shall refrain from objecting.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ANN A. DEVORE.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report submitted on Saturday on the bill S. 1760, an act granting a pension to Ann A. Devore, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement only be read.

EXCHANGE OF PUBLIC BUILDING SITES, GARLAND COUNTY, ARK.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1956) to authorize an exchange of sites for the public buildings of Garland County, Ark.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Whereas by act of Congress approved March 3, 1877, the United States granted to the county of Garland, State of Arkansas, a site for the public buildings of said county, not to exceed 5 acres; and

Whereas block No. 114 in the city of Hot Springs, consisting of 3.62 acres of land, was selected and dedicated to said county under said grant; and

Whereas said county is now desirous of constructing a county court-house and other public buildings upon lots Nos. 1, 2, 9, and 10 in block No. 94, which is now the property of the United States, and that it may be permitted to exchange the grant aforesaid for the last described tract of land: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1877, as grants to the county of Garland a tract of land not exceeding 5 acres as a site for the public buildings of said county, under authority of which act a tract of land in the city of Hot Springs, in said county, known and described as block 114, consisting of 3.62 acres, has been selected and dedicated under said grant, be, and the same is hereby, repealed and said lands restored to the United States to be disposed of as other Government lands in said city; and in lieu of said grant be, and there is hereby, granted to said county of Garland, as a site for the public buildings of said county, the following lots or parcels of land in said county and city, described in the plats and surveys of said city as follows, to wit, lots Nos. 1, 2, 9, and 10 in block No. 94, and said county is hereby authorized to take possession of the same without the further action of the Government.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

In line 13, after the word "city," strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Add a new section (section 2) as follows:

"SEC. 2. That there is hereby granted to the said county of Garland, as a site for the public buildings of said county, the following lots or parcels of land in said county and city, described in the plats and surveys of said city as follows, to wit: Lots No. 1, 2, 9, and 10 in block No. 94: Provided, however, That a public building to cost not less than $75,000 be constructed upon the lands herein donated within a period of three years from the date of the passage of this act, and that before the grant herein made shall take effect the title to block No. 114 shall be reconveyed to the United States. Each of these conditions shall be construed as a condition precedent to the grant herein made to the county of Garland, and a failure on its part to comply with either of them shall of itself work a forfeiture of the rights hereby conferred on said county."

Strike out the preamble.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was read the third time.

The amendment striking out the preamble was agreed to.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The committee amendments were as follows:

Strike out the period at the end of line 6 and insert a colon, and add the following:

"Provided, That if said railroad is not completed and in operation within the time herein limited, said company shall be subject to a penalty of $50 for each and every day that said road is not constructed and in operation, with cars running thereon, said penalty to be recovered by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia in any court of competent jurisdiction.

"SEC. 2. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was considered, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

FRAUDULENT SALES OF MERCHANDISE.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5067) to prevent the fraudulent sale of merchandise; and as the committee has reported a substitute for the original bill, I ask unanimous consent that the substitute be read in lieu of the original bill.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a sale of any portion of a stock of merchandise, otherwise than in the ordinary course of trade in the regular and usual prosecution of the seller's business, or a sale of an entire stock of merchandise in gross, will be presumed to be fraudulent and void as against the bona fide creditors of the seller, unless the seller and purchaser shall, at least ten days before the sale, make a full detailed inventory showing the quantity and, so far as possible with the exercise of reasonable diligence, the cost price to the seller of each article to be included in the sale; and unless such purchaser shall, at least ten days before the sale, in good faith, make full, explicit inquiry of the seller as to the names and places of residence or places of business of each and all of the creditors of the seller and the amount owing each creditor; and unless the purchaser shall, at least ten days before the sale, in good faith, notify or cause to be notified, personally or by registered mail, each of the seller's creditors, of whom the purchaser has knowledge, or can, with the exercise of reasonable diligence, acquire knowledge of said proposed sale and of the said cost price of the merchandise to be sold, and of the price proposed to be paid therefor by the purchaser. The seller shall, at least ten days before such sale, fully and truthfully answer, in writing, under oath, each and all of said inquiries.

SEC. 2. That nothing contained in this act shall apply to sales made by executors, administrators, receivers, or any public officer conducting a sale in his official capacity.

SEC. 3. That except as expressly provided in this act, nothing therein contained nor any act thereunder shall change or affect the present rules of evidence or the present presumptions of law.

SEC. 4. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] who reported the bill and will make a statement as to its effect.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I do not deem it very essential that much explanation of this measure should be given, because the wording of the bill seems to give a complete explanation of it. However, I wish to say that in almost every State of the Union there is in force legislation of this nature; that is to say, legislation to prevent the owner of a stock of merchandise, engaged in business as a merchant, to sell out the whole or a greater portion of the stock in gross and thus to defeat the claims of his creditors.

The bill as originally presented was simply to the effect that in case of a sale of this kind the parties to be protected were only the creditors of the merchant who had given him credit for merchandise sold and put into the business, or money loaned to him which was actually used in the business. These were made preferred creditors to the exclusion of all others.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I should like to know what committee reported this bill.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does it apply to this District only?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It applies only to the District of Columbia, or is so intended. It was referred to a subcommittee of our committee—the Subcommittee on the Judiciary—and was by them very carefully gone over. After the subcommittee had reported this subsitute, it was carefully gone over by the entire committee and several hearings were had thereon.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Has it been recommended by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The Commissioners recommended the bill in its original shape, but they have not had anything to say whatever as to the substitute—at least I believe not.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is this a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It is.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Have the merchants of this city demanded the passage of the bill?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. They have universally demanded the passage of a bill of this nature. Their representatives appeared not only before the whole committee but before the subcommittee and recommended this style of legislation. The only measure that they knew anything about was the original bill, which, as I have stated, treated as preferred creditors those who had supplied merchandise or money to the merchant. They have not had a hearing, nor have they asked any hearing, upon this substitute. They simply wanted some bill of this nature to prevent fraudulent sales of merchandise.

I wish to say that this legislation in its present form is the usual form adopted by nearly all the States of the Union.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Why does the gentleman say that this bill applies only to the District of Columbia? Will the gentleman point out any clause in the bill providing that it shall apply only to the District of Columbia and not wherever the jurisdiction of the United States extends?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. This bill was intended only—and I think perhaps if the gentleman will read it more carefully he will see that such is its effect—to apply to merchants doing business in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is mistaken in his conception of the bill. I have no doubt that what he states to have been its intention was such in fact; but this is only a further illustration of the looseness with which legislation is sometimes carried through. The original bill probably applied only to this District; the substitute, however, applies to all of the United States whenever we can enact legislation. I have just read the substitute for the first time. I find it contains no restriction as to the extent of its operation, and it would undoubtedly apply to interstate-commerce transactions and every transaction in the Territories.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I have no objection, and the committee has none, to allowing any amendment that the gentleman may suggest, limiting it to the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not think it is my business to suggest amendments of that sort. I think the gentleman should do that.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. If the gentleman has any objection to the bill, I would suggest that he propose an amendment.

Mr. COWHERD. I would suggest to my colleague that if after the word "sale," in line 17, page 4, he would add the words "in the District of Columbia," it would meet the objections that the gentleman makes.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. That is perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. MANN. The reason I have made the suggestion is because the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], in reply to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], stated that this only applied to the District of Columbia, and as I have just read the bill and can find no such restriction——

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. That was my understanding.

Mr. MANN (continuing). I felt it my duty to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. In explanation I will say that after reading over the various laws of this nature that have been passed in various States, I do not recall any State in which it says that the act is limited to the State of Minnesota, or the State of New York, or the State which passes the legislation.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman understands very well that the State of Minnesota can not enact a law that will be of any force outside of the State of Minnesota, and the same is true of any other State, but that does not apply to Congress.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I understand that, and I am very much obliged to the gentleman for the statement he has made.

Mr. PAYNE. We are all very glad to have that point settled. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Illinois for the suggestion he has made. The object of the committee that had this bill in charge was to prevent merchants in the District of Columbia and to prevent those who do business in the District of Columbia from defrauding their creditors. That is the object of it.

Mr. MANN. I understand from the public press that this is a copy of the Minnesota law, practically.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It is, practically; yes.

Mr. MANN. On its face I would like to suggest that it would interfere with legitimate transactions, and it might well be entitled "A bill to prevent a merchant from making a sale of his business to any other person." How does it operate in practice?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It may look so on its face, but it does not so operate in the West, where I have had experience with legislation of this kind. And I wish to say that the great State of New York has a still more stringent act than this, and a portion of this is copied from the law of the State of New York.

In New York the violation of the act is punished as a misdemeanor, and here there is nothing of the kind. This is not a copy of the Minnesota law strictly, although that law seemed to be more concise. It was originally copied from the New York law, and some features of that law have found their way into this.

I presume the gentleman is aware of the fact that Members who sit upon a committee—at least that is my experience—who have to do with the laws of their own State and the surrounding States and are more familiar with those laws than any others, are very likely to think that the "cackling of their bird is the wonder of the world," and largely engraft their ideas upon legislation of this kind.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will pardon me for saying that it is no discredit to the bill that it is a copy of a Minnesota law. That is the best thing about it that I have seen.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Barring the work of the committee, of course.

Mr. MANN. I will be frank with the gentleman, if he will yield——

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Certainly I will yield.

Mr. MANN. And I will say that it looked to me, upon reading this bill, as though it would be almost a preventive of an honest person making a sale of his business legitimately, because the moment he notifies his creditors that he proposes to sell out some of them will be almost sure to commence attachment proceedings or something of that sort.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I must confess that I am sorry the gentleman has that impression. It does not operate so within my experience.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman tell us——

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. None of the gentlemen of the committee related any such experience, but on the contrary they said that it worked beneficially.

Mr. MANN. We all understand the difficulties the gentleman would like to meet. Can he tell us whether as a matter of fact in the District of Columbia under the law if a merchant is about to sell out he is subject to attachment proceedings?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes; but the gentleman knows, being a lawyer, that an attachment proceeding avails very little if the goods are spirited away and the owner gets beyond the jurisdiction of the court.

Mr. MANN. I understand that, too; but if a creditor commences an attachment proceeding against a merchant his business is ruined.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. That is the case, I think, as a rule.

Mr. MANN. That is what I am afraid of.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. This does not aid in that matter particularly that I know of, but simply gives ten days leeway within which an attachment may be begun and within which a stock of goods can not be spirited away to the detriment of the wholesaler.

Now, I wish to say this, that we had a large number of the wholesale dealers of the city of Washington present before this committee, and they earnestly begged and prayed that a bill of this nature be passed, and even one a great deal more drastic than this. This bill is a great modification and simplification of the act which the merchants of this city demanded. Some of the retail merchants were there also and said that it interfered with their business because their credit was impaired, owing to the fact that there was no law in the District of Columbia to prevent a man from fraudulently disposing of his stock of merchandise.

Mr. MANN. You do not stop at preventing the fraudulent disposing of them. I ask the gentleman this question: Supposing there are two partners in this city engaged in business. Can one of them sell out to the other without advertising to all the world the cost price of all the goods they have, and notifying all of their creditors ten days in advance?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I presume it would apply. It says, "any sale or disposition of a stock of merchandise in gross." I do not know why it should not apply, if there is any fraud contemplated. If the gentleman who sells out is a wealthy individual and transfers the stock to an irresponsible party and he spirits it away, it is immaterial, to my mind, whether it be a partnership or not.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Certainly; that is what I am here for.

Mr. MANN. Suppose a merchant is indebted to twenty-five creditors, from whom he has purchased goods. Under this bill is he required to give the cost price of all of his goods to all of his creditors so that he notifies one man what he has paid another man for the goods that he purchased?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. "The reasonable cost price," as it says here, which he can ascertain with reasonable diligence. He must make an inventory of that. It is provided at the bottom of page 4:

Unless the seller and purchaser shall, at least ten days before the sale, make a full detailed inventory showing the quantity and, so far as possible, with the exercise of reasonable diligence, the cost price to the seller, of each article to be included in the sale.

Mr. MANN. Suppose he buys from Smith and Jones, two different persons. If he wants to sell out he must, under this bill, as I understand it, inform Smith the cost price——

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. And inform Jones also.

Mr. MANN. He must inform Smith how much he paid Jones for the goods he bought from him, and inform Jones how much he paid Smith for the goods he bought from him.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I think not, sir.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that that is what the bill says.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. No; I think not. He can simply figure up the amount of his inventory. He need not specify from whom the goods were obtained, but he can give it in gross to Mr. Smith and Mr. Jones.

Mr. MANN. To figure up the cost of the price on each article included in the sale.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. And that such cost price must be furnished each creditor.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Oh, no; need not say to Smith and Jones that a certain barrel of flour or sack of coffee was bought from any particular person.

Mr. MANN. Why is it necessary to tell one man anything about his business and from whom he bought?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I believe that legislation that has a tendency to prevent fraud is good legislation.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman believe that any legislation tending to prevent sale is good legislation?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes; if it prevents fraud. I will say to the gentleman, I do not see why the District of Columbia should not have similar laws in this connection that the various States of the Union have.

Mr. MANN. Well, I believe the gentleman is entirely mistaken in his premises. This law may be the law of Minnesota, and it may operate well there, and I have no doubt the gentleman may be correct about that, but I do not think there is any such drastic legislation in the majority of the States, or many of the States of the Union. This bill is one that I think ought to be entitled "A bill to prevent the transaction of business."

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The gentleman is entitled to his opinion.

Mr. MANN. That is all I get out of it.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It is not the opinion of the committee, nor is it the opinion of the wholesale dealers of the city of Washington.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call my colleague's attention to an amendment that seems to me should be offered to the bill. I will ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "merchant" in line 17, page 4, insert "in the District of Columbia;" and after the word "gross," in line 20, page 4, add "in the District of Columbia."

Mr. COWHERD. That will eliminate the objection that the gentleman makes that this applies to Territories.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. So far as I can, I accept the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

TELEPHONE RATES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, during the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill a short time since, and while I was absent from the city, a legislative amendment was offered and adopted affecting telephone rates. This amendment was practically the same as that passed several years since, and upon which the supreme court of the District of Columbia in its decision said in substance:

That the rates were unreasonably low and that the act amounted to a confiscation of the company's property, and was therefore unconstitutional and void.

The effect of this amendment, Mr. Speaker, will be to throw the matter into the courts again and cause a repetition of the litigation which has been existing here for years.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BABCOCK. I simply wish to make a statement in reference to that——

Mr. COWHERD. I simply want to say to the gentleman, having read a part of the language of the opinion, I think that the supreme court did not decide that these rates were too low, but decided, without sufficient information before them in the record, that they could not say whether it was unconstitutional and void.

Mr. BABCOCK. I read from the testimony before the Senate committee in a Senate document.

Mr. COWHERD. I was just asking for information, to see if I was mistaken about it.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope that some good will grow out of this amendment in the way of a permanent adjustment of telephone rates in the city of Washington; and in this connection, and for the information of the House, I ask to have this letter read in connection with my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE CHESAPEAKE AND POTOMAC TELEPHONE CO.,
Washington, D. C., March 10, 1904.

Hon. J. W. BABCOCK,
Chairman District of Columbia Committee of the House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: On the 2d instant the House of Representatives added to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, after the same had been reported, provisions fixing rates for certain classes of telephone service in the District of Columbia.

Inasmuch as The Chesapeake and Potomac Telephone Company is the only company affected by this legislation, and as this company has had no opportunity whatever to place before the House of Representatives or your committee reasons why such legislation should not be enacted, I take the liberty of submitting for your consideration the following statement of facts touching the affairs of this company.

This statement, I hope, may appeal to you with sufficient force to justify you in submitting it to the House of Representatives, to the end that should there be opportunity for so doing we may be permitted the privilege of being heard before final action is taken.

In 1901 the company entered upon a general plan of improvement. In the following year Congress passed a law authorizing the extension of the underground conduit system in Washington, and in that year 75 miles and in 1903 57 miles of underground ducts were constructed. In all subways (old and new) space for the fire and police wires of the District of Columbia are provided free of charge. (The telephones used by the District in its fire and police systems are furnished by this company at the rate of $5 per year.) A building costing, including site, about $200,000 was erected at Fourteenth and R streets NW., and upon its completion a modern central office equipment was installed therein. Another new building, to cost about $225,000, on Twelfth street near G NW., is nearing completion, in which a new and complete exchange equipment will be installed at an early date. The work is now under way and will be completed in the early part of this summer.

On the whole, in enlarging and improving the telephone plant in Washington, approximately $1,500,000 of new money has already been invested. The plans for construction and reconstruction work in 1904 alone call for an outlay of approximately of $750,000.

The purpose of the management has been and is to provide in Washington a telephone system that for comprehensiveness and completeness shall not be surpassed. In January of this year the plant now under construction was inspected by the general manager and chief engineer of the National Telephone Company of Great Britain. They had visited the principal cities of Europe and America, and upon the completion of their inspection declared that nowhere had they seen provision for the future made on such an adequate scale as in the city of Washington.

We appreciate that during the general reconstruction work that has been going on our service has not been up to the high standard of efficiency which we hope soon to be able to maintain. We practically have been replacing an old telephone plant with a new one, at the same time being compelled to keep the old one in constant operation.

A very rapid development of the system is going on. During 1903 the percentage of growth in telephones was larger in Washington than in any other city in America having a population of 150,000 or more, except Baltimore and St. Louis, and the percentage in Washington was only a fraction of 1 per cent less than in St. Louis.

On the 1st of March, 1904, there were approximately 12,159 stations in service, while on June 30, 1901, there were 6,726—an increase in twenty-one months of 81 per cent.

The rapid growth of the past few years has been largely due to the modifications of rates made from time to time. Apparently the present rates are not fully known and understood.

For business places the rates vary with the number of messages sent, a plan of graduated charges varying with the amount of use being the only one under which a wide and general use of the telephone in a great city can be accomplished. For residences the rates, except where several telephones are grouped on one circuit, are "flat." The annual charge for an unrestricted use with but one telephone on the circuit is $72 per year. This rate is subject to a discount of 50 per cent during suspension of service, which may be for four months in one year, thus reducing the charge in many cases to $60 per year. The rate for unrestricted use where the circuit is shared with one other subscriber is $48 per year. When four telephones on one circuit are used for different subscribers, the charge for each is $36 per year for the right to send 600 messages in the year. Telephone experts agree that to offer unrestricted use of telephones, where there are as many as four on one circuit, in a city as large as Washington would greatly impair the efficiency of the service, not only to the subscribers having such telephones, but to all users of the system.

The extent of the rate modifications made since 1898 is shown by the fact that at date the average rate per station was about $96, while at the first of this year it was less than $50.

In February, 1903, a statement respecting the litigation involving the validity of the act of June 30, 1898, was made to the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia. I attach hereto, for your information, a printed copy of that statement, which shows the history of the litigation from its beginning to that date. Since then the agreement of compromise referred to in the statement having become ineffective, the case was proceeded with in accordance with the mandate of the Supreme Court of the United States. After additional evidence was taken and arguments made, the supreme court of the District of Columbia held that the act in question did not apply to the class of telephone service generally in use in this city at the present time. An amicable settlement was made with the litigants, and the cases were by them dismissed.

In resorting to the courts the company did not feel that it was defying Congress, but only exercising that high privilege which the Constitution guarantees to every citizen, and throughout the litigation it proceeded on the understanding that Congress intended only to establish rates that would prove to be reasonable and fair.

The company was organized in 1883 with a capital stock of $2,650,000 (par value per share $100), which has not since been changed. Its bonded debt is $1,410,000.

Since 1883 the dividends paid have varied in amount. They may be summarized as follows: For three years at 5 per cent, for four years at 4 per cent, for three years at 3½ per cent, for one year at 3 per cent, for one year at 2½ per cent, for five years at 2 per cent per annum; for four years no dividends. Average for the period, 2.6 per cent per annum.

These statements relative to capitalization and dividends can easily be verified by inquiry at the office of any broker who deals in telephone securities. The dividends have been in no year excessive, but, on the contrary, far below the reasonable expectation of any investor, and the capital upon which they have been paid represents cash paid in and payments for telephone property necessary for the conduct of the business. No stock dividends have been declared and no division of profits, except the dividends mentioned, has ever been made.

The company operates in the District of Columbia and in parts of the States of Maryland and West Virginia. Of a total of 30,500 telephones in service, approximately 15,000 are in Baltimore, over 12,000 in Washington, and the remainder in other parts of the territory. The schedule of rates in Baltimore and Washington are substantially the same.

During 1903 the company's earnings from its entire operations, after meeting the operating expenses and the interest on its bonded and floating debt, yielded a revenue balance less than $2,700.

The floating debt referred to, now more than $2,500,000, has been created to provide for new construction during the past few years.

If the provisions in question are enacted into law, development will be arrested, the efforts of the company to provide an adequate plant and render efficient service will be seriously interfered with, and consequently the existing investment will, to a large extent, be destroyed.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, yours,

U. N. BETHELL, President.

The document referred to is as follows:

TELEPHONE RATES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

FEBRUARY 10, 1903.

The subcommittee having under consideration the amendment intended to be proposed by Senator GALLINGER to the bill H. R. 16824) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes, met pursuant to notice.

The amendment is as follows: After the word "dollars," in line 19, page 23, insert the following:

"Provided, That the provision in the act of June 30, 1898 (30 Stat., 538), fixing charges for the use of single or grounded wire telephones in the District of Columbia be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

Present: Senators DILLINGHAM (chairman) and MALLORY.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen, the committee is ready to hear any remarks that you may desire to make upon this proposed amendment.

STATEMENT OF UNION N. BETHELL, PRESIDENT OF THE CHESAPEAKE AND POTOMAC TELEPHONE COMPANY.

Mr. BETHELL. Mr. Chairman, I am the president of the Chesapeake and Potomac Telephone Company and appear here in its behalf.

At the outset I would like briefly to state the circumstances surrounding the enactment of the bill which it is proposed by this amendment to repeal, and to give in a few words the story of the litigation that has taken place.

As was customary in the early days of the telephone business in Washington the rates were flat; that is to say, there was one rate for all subscribers, regardless of their use of the telephone, whether large or small, and there were many practices or privileges which telephone subscribers enjoyed almost everywhere, and such as subscribers in small places now enjoy. For example, to name only one such privilege, all subscribers were permitted to use the telephone indiscriminately wherever they happened to be without any additional charge being imposed. In the course of the development of the business it became necessary to change some of these practices, and the company, instead of tactfully changing them, changed them perhaps arbitrarily and in that way antagonized a number of its subscribers. It was unfortunate enough to have the hotel proprietors antagonized, and then the druggists and physicians, and these various people got together and endeavored to adjust the matter with the company, but were unable to do so or unable to receive what they thought to be a proper consideration of their grievances, and then they came to Congress.

A committee was appointed by each of the Houses of Congress to investigate the matter, but while those investigations were proceeding, and before any report whatever was made, this bill, which subsequently became a law, was introduced as an amendment to the appropriation bill and was passed. There was really no hearing and no previous inquiry of any sort, so far as the records show. When Congress adjourned the expert accountant who had been appointed by the Senate to make an investigation of the company's books was employed by the company to continue his investigation to completion. The subscribers expected the company to comply with the law, but the company, feeling that it could not possibly do so on account of the low rates—the rates ranged from $25 to $50 per year for telephone service anywhere in the District of Columbia—declined to comply with the law, and a suit was brought to compel it to do so. This was followed by other suits, numbering perhaps something over 100 all told. Those were combined in one case, or a test case was made of one of them, and the others were consolidated with it, and the matter went to the supreme court of the District of Columbia.

The expert accountants had carefully gone over the books of the company from 1892 to 1898. They also had access to all papers of the company, and the books and papers were placed at the disposal of counsel on the other side. A mass of testimony also was taken respecting conditions not only in Washington, but in various cities of the United States and other countries. Exhaustive arguments upon the subject were made, and the supreme court of the District of Columbia held—I shall not attempt to quote any of the decisions verbatim, but merely give the substance of them—that the rates were unreasonably low, and that the act amounted to a confiscation of the company's property, and therefore the act was unconstitutional and void.

At that time the company had about 2,000 telephone stations. I mean by stations one of these sets of instruments from which you can talk to any other similar set of instruments. About one-half of them were on the old-style ground-circuit lines, with which, I take it, you are familiar; the other half were on metallic-circuit lines. No distinction was made in presenting the case by either side between these classes of lines. The total earnings and the total expenses of the company's business were divided by the total number of stations, and thus averages were obtained.

Immediately after that, or within the proper time, an appeal was taken to the court of appeals of the District, and there the case took quite a different turn, the decision being that the company, being a foreign corporation and operating in the District without a direct franchise from Congress, was required to accept the rates, whether reasonable or unreasonable, or withdraw from the District. Now, up to that time, or rather up to the beginning of this litigation, I think, there was no demand on the part of the public, or no wish rather, that the company should withdraw. There was no wish on the part of the company to withdraw, and the record of the investigation that was then going on in the House contains matter supporting that contention. I shall not, however, take the time to refer to it. The company, I wish to say by the way, had come here and had observed all the rules and practices enforced by the Commissioners, and had obtained proper permits and had constructed its plant, thinking at least that it was welcome to do business in the District, and thinking at least that it had the right to do so, but the court of appeals threw some doubt upon it, or at least held as I have stated.

Then the case went to the Supreme Court of the United States. Up to that time, as I have said, all of the counsel on both sides of the case had dealt with it as if it covered every telephone in the entire system—all classes of telephone. In fact, in granting the preliminary injunction, it was held that it covered every conceivable kind of a telephone. However, in its decision the Supreme Court of the United States pointed out that there were several different kinds of telephone equipment; there was a superior kind, a metallic service——

Senator MALLORY. That was all in the evidence before the court, was it not?

Mr. BETHELL. That was all in the evidence; yes, sir.

Senator MALLORY. They did not volunteer that?

Mr. BETHELL. No, sir; it was all shown in the evidence. As said by the court, there was a superior kind and an inferior kind or class, and in each of these classes there were several subclasses or grades; the law was not clear on the subject, and the trial court had not taken these facts into consideration. It therefore sent the case back for further inquiry as to which of these kinds of equipment Congress intended the rates to apply, and also whether or not the rates fixed were reasonable for the kind of equipment to which it might be found to apply.

That, I think, briefly, is the history of the litigation. We found at the end of four years—both parties found—that they were back at the starting point. During those four years the company had, although laboring under great difficulties, made a number of changes in its rates and in its practices. At the time the act was passed there were 2,000 stations and the average rate was about $98. At the present time there are something over 9,000 stations and the average rate is less than $56. So that during this period the conditions, so far as rates are concerned, have materially changed. The present rates of the company vary from $36 to $120 per year, the $36 rate allowing the subscriber to send 600 messages, the charge for additional messages from 5 to 3 cents each, according to the number used.

The company prior to the enactment of the law had introduced what is known as the "message-rate system," but had not published it at all, and at the time the law was enacted there were very few subscribers taking telephone service on that basis. At the present time over 80 per cent of the more than 9,000 (excluding Government telephones) pay for their service on the message-rate basis. In large cities—though not in small towns—it has been found by telephone engineers and managers, as well as students of the subject, that the best and perhaps the only practicable way to develop a telephone system is through a message-rate plan, or a plan of rates graded in some way. In New York, I may say in passing, in the last eight years under the message-rate system the number of stations has grown from about 10,000 to 105,000. Message rates have been adopted generally throughout the United States and in the principal European countries, but I have not the time to give you the details.

The CHAIRMAN. By that you mean that each subscriber pays in proportion to the amount of business done?

Mr. BETHELL. Yes, sir; he pays according to the amount of service rendered to him as measured by the number of messages he sends. The reasonableness of it seems clear. The man who sends one or two messages a day, or even five or six, should not pay the same as the large business house or Government bureau or department that sends 10,000 or more messages a year.

Without going too much into detail—the sending of a message means not only the use of the line between the telephone and the particular central office to which it is connected—that would not add much to the cost, but when you have a great comprehensive city system, with its several central offices, its various trunk lines, and its numerous operators, and its large staff, the volume of business directly affects your expense account. So there must be some scale of rates based upon the amount of service rendered to different subscribers. In the early days there was a crude basis, that is to say, business places were charged more than residences.

The average residence does not use as much as the average business place, and another thing, the residence use is extended through the hours of the day rather evenly, while those of the business house are congested within the few business hours, and your plant must be constructed in order to take care of the business at the busiest five minutes of the day, because in the telephone business you must provide a plant which will put everyone in the system immediately in connection with any other one with whom he desires to talk. None of the principles that I have spoken of apply to small places.

I may say also that, for the reasons suggested, even in a large city like this, a flat rate for residences may be a proper rate, as such a rate would not do violence to the general principles embodied in a message-rate plan.

Going to the other extreme—that is, taking the very largest users—you have people who require a great number of telephones, and for these private branch exchanges are provided; that is to say, a small switchboard is placed on their own premises, with a number of stations scattered throughout the premises, and from any one of these one may talk to anyone on the same premises, thus giving a private system; and from that switchboard there are lines running to the exchange system by which one can reach not only all points within the city, but also long-distance points. In this we have a combination of public and private systems. The rates are so arranged for a system of that kind that there is a specific charge for the equipment, a specific charge for the line, and a charge for the amount of service rendered. That is what I consider an ideal system. In Washington nearly all of the Government Departments have large systems of this kind.

One of the peculiar things connected with this law, showing its vagueness, is this circumstance: Soon after it was enacted the question arose as to what those private branch exchange telephones were. There was a rate for a telephone on a separate wire; one for two on a wire, and one for three, and one for four or more on a wire, and there it stopped with those four classes. Private branch exchange stations did not seem to the company to fall into any of these classes. There was a combined private and public use, and the highest class of facilities and the highest class of service, which we thought was special and apart, which did not fall within the purview of the act. But the supreme court of the District of Columbia, in the first injunction case, held that it covered every conceivable kind of telephone. When the question came to the Comptroller of the Treasury, he, following that decision, felt that he must place these telephones in one of these classes named. Taking the number of stations and the number of trunk lines and dividing the one by the other, he obtained a quotient greater than four, and therefore held that these telephones must go in the class of four or more on a line, giving the company for the highest kind of equipment and service the lowest rate provided for in the act.

That would have worked out fairly well if in all cases all of the stations in the various departments had been confined within one building, but these 325 telephones were established in the houses of some of the officers of the Departments, sometimes at great distances away, in branch offices, in stables, etc. The company was required, because its lines were underground, to run lines connecting each of these stations with its central office and thence back again to the Department, and perhaps furnish twice the lines and sometimes four or five times the service that it would to an ordinary subscriber paying the highest rate. If that were done only in exceptional cases there would be no especial hardship on the company, but it occurred in a great many cases. As a result the Government under the statute receives service at far below its cost.

To maintain a living average rate, if a large amount of the business is at rates below the average, the rates above the average must be kept at a very high point. Therefore with Government business being done at less than cost an improper burden is thrown on the citizens of the District. By these conditions the company's hands have been tied so that it could not reduce some rates that it otherwise would have reduced and should reduce.

About a year ago the company felt that it ought to extend its plant and introduce a modern system here. Up to that time, although the ground-circuit lines had practically disappeared, the central office equipment was of an old type. We were unable to construct lines because several years ago Congress had directed that no further permits should be issued by the Commissioners until a certain date occurred, or until a certain event happened, and as a result of that we were unable to put down underground lines or lay out a comprehensive plan for the development of the telephone business here on a large scale. The streets were full of overhead wires. It was impossible for the company to take them down because there were no subways. Very often, in order to connect a subscriber, it was necessary to run a long line over a circuitous route, over housetops and through alleys. Thus we were required to incur a great amount of unnecessary expense. For, it must be remembered, many of these lines were to be but temporarily used, because in a short time public sentiment would not allow them to remain overhead and, further, it would not be to the company's interest to keep them there. As a result of all this, it is necessary to take down a large amount of plant and sell it practically as junk.

The matter came before Congress last summer, and an act was passed permitting an extension of the subway system. During last year, although the act was not passed until the middle of the year, having excellent weather and being able to work right up to the close of the year, we constructed over 12 miles of conduit. We have already presented our plans to the Commissioners for an equal amount for the present year. A large amount of it is to be constructed in the eastern portion of the city and a large amount of it over in Georgetown, and it is proposed within the next two years, if the company is permitted to carry out its plans, if not restricted by adverse legislation, to expend in the betterment of its plant here—that is, in new work—about a million dollars. After that time, if the business develops as it should, there will perhaps be another million to expend; but as to the future I have not made exact calculations. I speak of this because the company in investing this money realizes that to succeed it must have the good will of the public. It is absolutely dependent on that good will to obtain a fair and reasonable return upon this investment as well as the investment already made. To secure and retain this good will it appreciates that it must give good service, fair treatment, and reasonable rates.

During the inquiry made by Congress in 1898, which was never completed, an officer of the company, being asked what profits it expected to make, made the unfortunate response, 35 per cent. He meant by profits the difference between the operating expenses and the gross earnings. Bookkeepers sometimes call that difference "profits." In the railroad business, for instance, it takes about 65 per cent of the gross earnings merely to operate the plant; the remainder of these so-called "profits" must provide for depreciation of plant, bad accounts, contingencies of various sorts, and, finally, for interest on the investment. It was that which he had in mind and that which he afterwards explained he had in mind. But his first statement, without the explanation, was heralded through the press and talked about generally. That made the public—and I am not finding fault with the public for so concluding—suppose that the company was not satisfied with less than 35 per cent in the way of interest on its investment. During the last year, 1902, the earnings and expenses of the company were such that even at the contract rates the earnings were not sufficient to meet the operating expenses, provide a reasonable amount for depreciation, and pay 6 per cent on its capital actually invested. Without reference to any question of bonds and stock I simply say that the earnings were not sufficient to pay the operating expenses, provide a reasonable fund for depreciation, and pay 6 per cent on its actual investment.

Senator MALLORY. What do you mean by contract rates as distinguished from other rates?

Mr. BETHELL. We use the term contract rates to distinguish them from statutory rates.

Senator MALLORY. Have you been observing the statutory rates?

Mr. BETHELL. No, sir; that is what all this litigation has been about.

Senator MALLORY. They have not got out any injunction during this time?

Mr. BETHELL. Yes, sir; I am coming to that point. Each one of these hundred cases that I have spoken of came up in the nature of an application for an injunction, and in each of the cases the company was enjoined from charging more than the statutory rate.

Senator MALLORY. It was a preliminary injunction, was it?

Mr. BETHELL. It was a preliminary injunction; yes, sir. It was provided, however, that the difference between the statutory rate and the contract rate should be kept in suspension, and in the event of a decision favorable to the company there was an undertaking in each case that the amount would be paid in full with interest.

Only a few days ago this matter was taken up with the Telephone Subscribers' Association with a view to settling our differences, if we could, in an amicable way. The Telephone Subscribers' Association was the crystallization of those several elements of dissatisfaction already spoken of, and they thought they were protecting the public interests. I think myself, with all due respect to them, that they stood in the way of the public interests, but that difference of opinion amounts to nothing, because from their standpoint I am perfectly satisfied that they felt they were working for the public interests all the way through. The Subscribers' Association had, at the outset, some 700 or 800 active members. Of 2,000 subscribers that is a very large percentage. At the present time there are 9,000 or more stations—these, however, include the Government telephones—and of this large body of subscribers the Telephone Subscribers' Association represents only a few, perhaps not more than 200. Although numerically small, it is composed of some of the most influential men in the city, and men whose good will is particularly desired.

I found the gentlemen representing the association in a most conciliatory mood and I felt exactly the same way. We had had a long war and a good fight and a fair fight. They had fought us fairly all the way through, and neither of us knew just exactly how to proceed, because we were back again at the starting point. The company was willing to make a considerable concession to settle those hundred suits, if it was possible to settle them. The association had been waging what it considered a war for the public interests. The hundred who had obtained injunctions had borne the trouble and expense of the war, and it was thought that they were entitled to some special consideration. I was willing to wipe out the old score; cross off the amount which we had held in suspense in these wars, and, as to those subscribers, accept the payments which they had made at statutory rates and release them from all the rest. But, from the standpoint of the association, that seemed hardly fair to all the interests involved, because certain people who were not represented in those suits had contributed money to the association, and the association owed some debts which should be discharged.

It was therefore suggested that, instead of remitting the entire amount of the suspended accounts in question, we should remit one half of it and pay an amount equal to the other half, as estimated, to the association, that it might refund certain contributions and discharge its debts.

That suggestion was acceptable to me, and an agreement has been entered into by which, in the event of the repeal of this act, all of these suits shall be dismissed on the basis stated.

I have given you briefly the substance of the agreement. If there are any particulars which you desire to know I shall be pleased to give them to you.

There are a number of other associations in Washington, some of them quite prominent, and I have a few letters from them which I will leave with the committee, that they may be printed in the record.

I may say that after this agreement with the association was reached I thought it proper to ascertain how some of the other associations felt about the matter, because I have been doing business with a great many people connected with these associations during the last year. I knew how some of them felt, and therefore this morning, by a personal visit or through a representative, I have consulted a number of the officers of these associations.

Last October, 1902, the Columbia Heights Citizens' Association were good enough to transmit to me the following resolution of thanks for extending our subway system to their section, and with the assurance of its cooperation in furthering all matters of mutual benefit to the public and the telephone company.

The resolution is as follows:

"Whereas the measure delimiting the territory for underground conduits for telephone wires has become a law, with the northern part of said territory extended so that Columbia Heights and adjacent subdivisions are included to Park street and Whitney avenue on the north and to Eleventh street on the east, instead of to Columbia road and Thirteenth street, respectively, as originally proposed.

"Whereas for this proper extension the citizens of Columbia Heights and adjacent subdivisions are indebted to the recommendation of Commissioner Macfarland and to the hearty cooperation of Mr. U. N. Bethell, president of the Chesapeake and Potomac Telephone Company: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Columbia Heights Citizens' Association tender to these gentlemen its thanks, and also the assurance of its cooperation to further all matters of mutual benefit to the public and the telephone company."

In view of the following letter addressed to this committee by Charles S. Bundy, first vice-president of the Columbia Heights Citizens' Association, on the 10th instant the matter was again brought up.

"I am much gratified to learn that a better feeling has begun to be manifest between the Telephone Subscribers' Association and the Chesapeake and Potomac Telephone Company, and that the indications are that complete agreement may yet be reached whereby the company will be permitted to perfect their present plans for the extension of its underground cables and improved service. The Columbia Heights Citizens' Association, for a considerable period of time, occupied a hostile position toward the company for the reason that the opinion prevailed that the company were unwilling to put their service wires underground, and a committee, of which I had the honor to be chairman, was appointed to confer with the company and try to bring about an exchange of views to the end that all wires in Columbia Heights might be buried. The several interviews had between this committee and the officers of the telephone company served to convince the committee that the managers of the company had been greatly misjudged, and, so far from desiring to maintain their overhead system, were only too glad to be allowed to bury their wires.

"This resulted in a complete reconciliation, and I believe that I voice the sentiment of the citizens of Columbia Heights when I say that they are unanimously in favor of a liberal policy toward the telephone company and in favor of extending to the company every encouragement to the end that they may complete their plans and furnish to the people of the District an up-to-date telephone service at reasonable rates. If there is anything in the existing law to prevent the company from accomplishing this, then the law surely should be repealed. Believing as we do now in the friendly disposition of the management of the telephone company, we would be perfectly willing that the company should be permitted to establish a scale of rates fair to the public and the company alike, leaving to a future session of Congress any laws which may hereafter appear to be necessary."

The Chesapeake and Potomac Telephone Company has also received the following communications from other associations in the District of Columbia containing similar expressions of approval, which I will read:

BUSINESS MEN'S ASSOCIATION OF WASHINGTON, D. C.,
Washington, D. C., February 19, 1903.

MY DEAR SIR: The Business Men's Association has, as you and the public well know, been most active and energetic in its efforts to bring about such adjustment of the telephone rates as will best subserve the public interest. Understanding that a satisfactory conclusion has been reached between the Telephone Subscribers' Association and your company, I feel that every encouragement should be given the Chesapeake and Potomac Telephone Company to prosecute its work along its present lines. I am satisfied that your company has for some time been making every effort to bring its system into conformity with the public wishes, and it has been sparing no effort to better its equipment to meet the requirements of the people. I feel, therefore, that no encouragement to your efforts should be withheld, but on the contrary your endeavors to broaden and better the telephone system in the District of Columbia upon the basis of reasonable charges should not only receive the support of our association, but of citizens generally.

I am, sir, very truly, yours,

BARRY BULKLEY, Secretary.

FEBRUARY 10, 1903.

GENTLEMEN: Replying to your inquiry of this morning, I beg to say that, as a subscriber and a resident of the northwest suburbs of the city, I heartily commend the efforts the company is making to extend its lines and improve its service in that direction, and I will approve any equitable plan which may be suggested to settle the pending suit with subscribers.

Very truly, yours,

JAMES H. TAYLOR.

BRIGHTWOOD AVENUE CITIZENS' ASSOCIATION,
DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
February 10, 1903.

DEAR SIR: I feel that the telephone service has improved in last few years; rates or charges have been reduced materially, and suburban service particularly extended to accommodate the people of Takoma, Brightwood, and vicinity.

——— ———.

FEBRUARY 10, 1903.

DEAR SIR: On behalf of the Mount Pleasant Citizens' Association, I desire to thank you for your attendance at our recent meeting and for the information given us about the plans of the company to extend its lines in our section of the city and about rates for telephone service.

I feel that the company has done much during the last few years to modify its rates and establish a schedule of rates fair to the public as well as the company, and hope that it will be permitted to continue to adjust its past difficulties with its subscribers in a manner satisfactory to all concerned, as we feel sure, under the improved conditions, it can if not prevented by adverse legislation.

Very truly, yours, ROBERT H. YOUNG.

NORTHEAST WASHINGTON CITIZENS' ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D. C., February 10, 1903.

DEAR SIR: Having been advised that your company is desirous of extending your conduit lines into northeast Washington, I deem it due to the citizens of northeast Washington to lend my aid to such proposition, that section being now nearly destitute of telephone convenience, greatly to the detriment of business facilities. Moreover, very few of the streets being paved, I deem it opportune to suggest that it would be well to lay the conduits now instead of after paving.

Very respectfully, yours, EVAN H. TUCKER, President.

CITIZENS' NORTHWEST SUBURBAN ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D. C., February 10, 1903.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your inquiry of this morning concerning the telephone service in our section as supplied by your substation recently installed at Somerset Heights, I would say it is entirely satisfactory both as to efficiency and rates charged.

There is perhaps no part of the District of Columbia in which prompt telephone service is so necessary as in the northwestern suburbs, where residents are widely scattered and the public utilities, including transportation and police and fire protection, are less adequate than within the city limits. Since the installation of the substation at Somerset Heights we have been able to connect our houses at moderate rates, with the fire and police departments and with local and city physicians, as well as with our places of business in town, and thus the chief objections to suburban residence have been removed. We hope that the establishment of this service will do much to develop our section, and I desire to express our appreciation of your cooperation in this direction.

Very truly, yours,

W. L. CROUNSE,
Chairman Telephone Committee
Citizens' Northwest Suburban Association.

These letters and the agreement with the Telephone Subscribers' Association indicate, I think, that the entire community is fairly and fully represented and is not opposed to the proposed amendment. I trust that the committee may see its way clear to favorably report upon the measure, and that by its repeal the company will be permitted to carry out its plans for the improvement of its plant and service and to establish a schedule of rates which will be fair and satisfactory to all concerned.

I thank you, gentlemen, for your attention.

STATEMENT OF MR. A. A. BIRNEY, OF ATTORNEYS FOR THE TELEPHONE SUBSCRIBERS' ASSOCIATION.

Mr. BIRNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, as one of the attorneys for the Telephone Subscribers' Association, who have carried on this contest from its inception to the present time, I feel that because of the very frank statement which the president of the telephone company has submitted concerning that contest leaves very little to be added by me. But as the association has requested that we submit our views to the committee, we have preferred to put them in writing, which we have done. They are signed by me and my associates, Henry F. Woodard and John J. Hemphill, as attorneys for the association.

We are directed by the Telephone Subscribers' Association to state to the committee its attitude upon the pending question. This association was formed early in 1898 with the purpose to secure, if possible, fair rates and fair service from the telephone company. As a result of its agitation of the subject the proviso now proposed to be repealed was enacted. Afterwards the association was, against its will, forced to assume the labor and cost of compelling compliance with that statute. This, in our opinion, should have been undertaken by the legal department, since the Government was financially much more interested in supporting the law than any limited number of citizens could be. For more than four years this expensive effort has continued, and we now find ourselves not advanced beyond the starting point, so far as the final determination of the legal question is involved. No questions in the case have been finally determined, and if litigation continue, several years must pass before they can be determined by the court of last resort.

The act of 1898 was never satisfactory to anyone. Its author did not intend that it should become a law in the form in which it was presentd by him to the House of Representatives, and it has been always regarded by the association as wholly inadequate to the situation. It does not at all cover the ground, and if it is to stand it should be added to by further provisions.

The association also recognizes that since the passage of this act of 1898 local conditions have greatly changed. Improvements in methods have been introduced, and average rates of charges have been lessened. In view of these changes the act of 1898 is yet more unsatisfactory, and in the light of information, not accessible in 1898, the justice of the act has become more doubtful. The association also finds that many of its supporters in 1898 are now apparently satisfied with the treatment accorded them by the telephone company, and are unwilling to give further financial or moral support to the continuance of litigation.

The association has never wished to do injustice to this company, and under existing circumstances is willing to withdraw its opposition to the proposed act of repeal, and rely upon the sense of justice of Congress to see to it hereafter that a proper inquiry be made into what are fair rates and to compel them.

ARTHUR A. BIRNEY,
HENRY F. WOODARD,
JOHN J. HEMPHILL,
Attorneys for the Association.

Senator MALLORY. As I understand it, from the point of view of the association, you have no objection to the repeal of this statute?

Mr. BIRNEY. No. As stated by Mr. Bethell, the president of the telephone company, an adjustment has been made of the matters with the association. But we are influenced by the consideration which is stated here, and we have no wish to oppose this proposed repeal.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Moore, have you a copy of this bill?

Mr. MOORE. There is one before you.

Mr. STAPLES. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that in addition to the discharge of these suits the telephone company has agreed with us that during the next Congress that company will agree to some bill to be passed by this body that will be fair and equitable to the citizens as well as to the telephone company. That is your understanding, Mr. Bethell?

Mr. BETHELL. That is not my understanding. My understanding was had with the attorney of the association, and if there is any misunderstanding between myself and the attorney, the attorneys should speak. The contract is very clear on that point.

Mr. BIRNEY. That is all right.

Mr. STAPLES. That is all right, is it not, Mr. Bethell? We want that to go before the citizens' association.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman, I understand that this measure proposes to repeal the former act. Does it?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, just simply proposes a repeal.

Senator MALLORY. Mr. Birney, if the committee offered an amendment to repeal the act, the amendment to have the indorsement of the Committee on the District of Columbia, that will be agreeable to all concerned?

Mr. BIRNEY. So far as we understand the proposition.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes; we will leave the matter in your hands.

Thereupon the subcommittee adjourned.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the printed statement in connection with the letter be printed with the letter, but that the reading be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the printed statement be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Reserving the right to object, I want to know the character of this printed statement.

Mr. BABCOCK. It is the evidence before the Senate committee on this subject.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. When taken?

Mr. BABCOCK. Taken in February.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. February of this year?

Mr. BABCOCK. In 1903. It is simply a question of facts and for the information of the House.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Is the gentleman ready to answer any interrogatories with reference to the operation of this company, and can he give us any information or light upon the subject of the amount of reserve fund?

Mr. BABCOCK. This statement is intended to cover all of those points, and gives the financial status of the company. I simply make the request to have this published for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to object to anything that is asked for; but I do desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Wisconsin, who is chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, if there was any prospect of that committee taking into consideration or recommending legislation from that committee relative to the relief of the people of this District from the oppressive charges made by the telephone company for its very inefficient service.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, in answer to that I would say that I sincerely hope that the amendment——

Mr. BARTLETT. I can not hear the gentleman.

Mr. BABCOCK. I will say that I hope that out of this amendment adopted on the appropriation bill a settlement of the rate question can be made. The gentleman himself, when h investigates the amendment, will find that it does not answer the purpose that he intended when he offered it, and the object in presenting this information to the House is that between the House and the Senate, or in the conference committee, the rate question can be adjusted so that the District Committee will not have to take it up again.

Mr. BARTLETT. If I may be permitted to say in reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. Speaker, I was fully aware that the amendment offered by myself to the District appropriation bill would not of itself relieve the situation, because I was compelled under the parliamentary rule on which we considered that bill to reenact the present law, which the telephone company since 1898 have been defiantly violating in this District.

I was in hopes that with that as a basis the Senate and the conference committees of the two Houses, when they came to consider that amendment, would have an opportunity and would take advantage of it to enact the necessary legislation which would relieve the people of this District from the enormous charges and excessive rates which are now in existence for that service, and I am very glad to know from the chairman of the District of Columbia Committee that he is in sympathy with that view.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, to say one word in reference to that amendment which the gentleman offers. He provides there for a charge of some $25 to the District; that they shall not exceed, I think, twenty or twenty-five dollars.

Mr. BARTLETT. Fifty dollars for a single wire, $40 for two wires, and so on down to $25.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the charge to the District for telephones used by the police and fire departments, which includes the free use of underground ducts and pole lines, is only $5; and that amendment, if adopted, would permit the company to increase its charge very materially.

Mr. BARTLETT. No, sir. The report made to the chairman, Mr. McCLEARY, the gentleman from Minnesota, who had that bill in charge, by the president of this telephone company stated that the charges were $50 for a single wire, and so on, in accordance with the law; that with reference to the telephones which were used for Government purposes they obeyed the law.

Mr. BABCOCK. The District, I am talking about.

Mr. BARTLETT. That for the public service rendered to the Government in the District of Columbia they obeyed the law, but when they came to deal with individuals they defied the law. That is in the record.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say in reference to this charge that they have complied with the decisions of the court, which is the final arbiter and judge of legislation.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, the company has not complied with the decisions of the court—I beg to differ with my distinguished friend—because the Supreme Court of the United States decided the case and sent it back to the District of Columbia court for investigation as to whether or not the charges were reasonable, and the telephone company settled with the then plaintiffs in that case to get it out of court and have no case pending. They never had a determination judicially as to whether their rates were reasonable or not or whether they could be made to comply with the law. They settled with the plaintiffs in that case, and they proceeded to increase their charges. They have not complied with the law.

Mr. BABCOCK. That was long ago.

Mr. BARTLETT. That was in 1900.

Mr. BABCOCK. The gentleman should post himself on the decisions of the courts.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have posted myself on the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in that case; there has been no decison since.

Mr. BABCOCK. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The case was proceeded with in accordance with the mandate of the Supreme Court of the United States. After additional evidence was taken and arguments made, the supreme court of the District of Columbia held that the act in question did not apply to the class of telephone service generally in use in this city at the present time. Consequently this legislation was not effective.

Mr. BARTLETT. Well, I do not know anything about the decision in the District courts.

Mr. BABCOCK. The gentleman is quoting that in face of the decision, and I simply wanted to correct him.

Mr. BARTLETT. I quote the decision as reported, and I quote the statements of the gentlemen who were parties to that case and the patrons of this company who were not a party, and the gentleman will not now state that the case ever went to a final determination. The gentleman can not state more than the case was appealed from the District court up to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, where the right to make these charges was withheld, and then appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and finally decided by a divided court, and the right of Congress to fix the rate was not denied, but it was referred back to the District court to take evidence as to what could be done under this law, as to whether these charges were reasonable or not.

That is history, and I do not think the gentleman can contradict that statement as the history of this litigation. A great deal of evidence was taken and before they got through taking the evidence the expenses and costs grew to such an enormous amount, the citizens themselves having to bear the burden of the litigation, that they got discouraged and settled with their adversary.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman said there was no final decision.

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not so understand it.

Mr. BABCOCK. The settlement the gentleman refers to was made long ago before the decision of the supreme court of the District. The decision of that court is comparatively recent, in compliance with the order of the United States Supreme Court. The decision was that the law did not apply to a metallic circuit such as was in use in the District of Columbia. That was the final decision of the supreme court of the District.

Mr. BARTLETT. If that be true——

Mr. BABCOCK. The gentleman suggested that the court has not handled it.

Mr. BARTLETT. The information of the gentleman from Wisconsin is more recent than my own, and I accept what he says as true. But even if it be true, does not the gentleman from Wisconsin think that if Congress has not passed a law which authorizes and requires these gentlemen to furnish a service at a reasonable rate, it ought to do it as soon as possible?

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Georgia to read the letter and the information put in the RECORD this morning, and he will then be better able to determine what is a reasonable rate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that when I questioned the statement that he first read as the decision of the court, I understood that he was reading from the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. As I remember it now and as I am informed by the gentleman from Wisconsin, it was a decision of the District of Columbia court. The Supreme Court of the United States did not pass on the question as to the reasonableness of these rates, but, as the gentleman from Georgia suggested, they sent it back for further hearing to report all the facts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MEDAL FOR JOHN HORN, OF DETROIT, MICH.

Mr. LUCKING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10306) to authorize a duplicate medal to be struck off and presented to John Horn, of Detroit, Mich., for life saving.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to strike off and present to John Horn, of Detroit, Mich., a duplicate of the medal voted by Congress to him in the year 1874, for saving many lives from drowning, in place of the said medal, which was stolen from him in October, 1901.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask what committee this comes from.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, as the Chair is informed.

Mr. LUCKING. It is recommended by the Department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LUCKING, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. BOUTELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. POWERS.]

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I think I can fairly assume that it will not be an unwelcome diversion if I invite the House to the consideration of some subjects not directly connected with the postal investigation. I can not refrain from making some comment upon the scenes of Wednesday and Friday of last week, which were witnessed by this House and the public. To my mind it was the indignant and defiant uprising of the membership of this House when the apparent imputation was made that a large number of Members had been guilty of misconduct in the discharge of duty. The resentment was shared in quite as fully by those who were not named as by those who were.

There was no Member conscious of willful misconduct, nor was there one who believed that any Member was guilty of such misconduct. Is it surprising, under the circumstances, that there was exhibited some temper and a display of righteous resentment? For more than a century this legislative body has stood as the best and highest expression of the popular will of the American people, its integrity unquestioned and its loyalty unassailed. It could not afford even for a single moment to allow the accusation or even the insinuation to remain unanswered. But if this investigation shall have the effect to determine and fix the relations between the great legislative department of the Government and the great Executive Departments of the Government, it will not have been in vain. [Applause.]

I had always, Mr. Chairman, assumed that there was no citizen in this country, however so humble, that he could not approach any executive officer of our Republic to present any well-founded grievance and make any reasonable request. If it be true that he has not the right to present to the great Department of the Government which we call the Post-Office Department his grievances, his reasonable requests, whether he make them himself or present them through his representative in Congress, it strikes me that it is time that we knew it. [Applause.] I had also assumed that the Members of this legislative body were here in the discharge of their duties as the representatives or delegates of the American people, and as such we had a right to make known their wishes, their necessities, their wants to any member of an Executive Department.

If it be true that we have not that right, the time has come when we should know what our rights are. The time has come when it should be written in the law how far we are to be permitted to go in the proper discharge of duty.

Why, sir, what is the executive branch of the Government? Outside of a few officers created by the Constitution, Congress has created all those offices. We have defined their duties. Each year we make appropriations for the maintenance of these Departments. We, as the representatives of the people, from the time of the adoption of the Constitution, have gone to the Executive Departments and made known the wants of our people.

It will not be claimed, Mr. Chairman, that the Post-Office Department is infallible. It is not true that the Post-Office Department gives service of a uniform character throughout the country. It is not true that it performs its service without more or less discrimination. If I find in my district an instance where the Department in the matter of postal service is discriminating against one office in favor of another office, have I no right to bring that matter to the attention of that Department?

Within the past few weeks I have had occasion many times to call upon the Post-Office Department—under no assumption that it was hedged in by privilege; under no assumption that it had put up a wall or a barrier against my right to appear there in behalf of my constituents—and I have made known to that Department a case of discrimination which is, I say, a discredit to the service. May I take the time, just for a moment, to illustrate that case?

The town of Wellesley, located in my district, has a population of some five or six thousand. For the past fifteen years there has been occupied for the business of the post-office a room for which the Government has paid $650 a year. That building is to-day unsanitary, unhealthy, without any modern appliances whatever, and with a lobby which the public have to use of only 10 feet square. That office in the last fourteen years through its receipts has paid the entire expense of the postal service of that town and turned into the Treasury of the United States, to be used elsewhere, $70,000, or $5,000 each year.

Some two years ago the people of Wellesley petitioned for better postal accommodations. The protest against the present office building came from all classes of citizens, from the hod carrier to the president of Wellesley College.

Now, I assumed that under those circumstances I had the right to go to the proper authorities in the Department and present that situation. I have done so. I have presented to them a proposition by which they may go to a new block, with twice the space they now occupy, with all modern conveniences, for an increased rental of $100. Up to the present time they have refused to make that change.

Yet, if I had succeeded in accomplishing what I have undertaken to accomplish—in providing for the people of that town an office suitable to their needs—a people who pay their own expenses for maintaining that office and turn over $5,000 a year in addition to the Government—if I had succeeded in carrying out the wishes of my people, I should have increased the expense of that station $100 a year, and I should have had the honor or the disgrace or the distinction, whatever you may choose to call it, of being enrolled in that list of Members which has been spread before the House.

I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that if the time has come when Members of this great body, representing in the aggregate 80,000,000 of people, can not make known the wants of their constituents to any Executive Department of the Government, we want to know it, and we want our relations with every Executive Department fixed, if necessary by law, declaring that our rights shall not be infringed by secret orders or infringed through the despotism of any petty chief. [Applause.]

It is not my purpose to go further into this question of the postal investigation. I have a feeling that the facts of this matter are coming out for the welfare of the people and for the justification of this House. I have no feeling that anything will occur in this investigation which will cast discredit upon this great legislative body. I have no feeling that our constituencies have lost confidence in any man upon this floor, and I do not suspect that in the elections which are soon to take place any Member of this House will receive less votes because he has had the energy and zeal to visit this great Department of the Government and make known the wants and needs of his constituents.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman think there is any question now as to the legality of a Member of the House of Representatives representing his constituents in official matters before any of the Departments in the manner that has been done in connection with Post-Office matters as shown in the report to which reference is made?

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. I have never assumed that there was any question about it; personally I do not assume now that there is any question. But a Department apparently has seen fit to raise such a question, and I want to see that question settled either by the Post-Office Committee or by the select investigating committee; and if necessary that it be written in the law, I want to see it so written.

Why, Mr. Chairman, on that point, if it be true that we have not any right to make any suggestions to the Post-Office Department or to the executive branch of the Government, what right have the Post-Office Department to make suggestions to us? Take this bill as reported by the committee, and there is hardly a line in that bill in which there is not some recommendation upon the part of some one connected with the executive branch. If they can come to us and make known their needs, why should we not have the right to come to them and make known the needs of our constituents?

No one can consider this important bill now before the House without being tremendously impressed with the growth and development of the American people. This great agency of Government, the Post-Office Department, comes a little closer to the people than any other function of our governmental agency. When we consider that we have set up here an agency which establishes what may be called a "personal" relation between the Government and every inhabitant of this great country, we recognize the effect and influence of the Government over the people. A citizen in Eastport, Me., may give to this great agency a letter to be delivered to a citizen in San Francisco, and the Government must deliver that letter in accordance with his written instructions.

The person receiving that letter directs the Government to return a reply to the sender thousands of miles away, and all this is performed with dispatch and efficiency and for the smallest kind of a compensation, when you take into consideration the value of the service rendered. I notice that this bill carries nearly $170,000,000 for its maintenance for the ensuing year. When the postal service was established in this country, how little did those who inaugurated it think of what was to be its extension. To-day we not only have the free delivery in the great centers of population, but the business man of New York or Chicago, Philadelphia or Boston, may hand to this great agency of Government a letter which is delivered at the door of a logging camp in the woods of the State of Maine or at the door of a farm house upon the prairies of the Dakotas.

And this leads me to ask the consideration of the House for a few moments to two questions. One is the tremendous growth of Federal power, and the other is the tremendous growth of what may be termed "governmental paternalism." Have you ever considered, Mr. Chairman, the growth of Federal power in this country since the adoption of the Constitution? The thirteen States composing the original Union conferred what they supposed were very limited powers upon the central Government. Some seventy years ago, when De Tocqueville, the great French economist, came to this country for the purpose of studying our people and our form of Government and wrote his great book, Democracy in America, he said he was impressed with the weakness of the Federal Government; and he said that just so surely as the States resisted the Federal authority, just so surely the Federal authority would yield. That was in 1832; but that has all changed.

Even up to the time of the civil war views of a similar kind were entertained by strong and able men in all parts of the country. You remember that much-mooted question which prevailed for twenty years in this country prior to the outbreak of the civil war, when men in this Chamber as well as in the Chamber at the other end of the Capitol claimed that a State had the right voluntarily to withdraw from the Union.

But the close of the civil war settled all those questions. Then it was that we commenced to be a nation. Then it was that the States throughout the Union commenced to see the necessity of a strong central power; and to-day I imagine that there is no nation where the central power is stronger than it is in the United States.

We have lived for more than a century under one constitutional form of government. We are the oldest nation in the world to-day with the exception of Great Britain and Russia. We live under a written Constitution, but that written Constitution has been yielding year by year to the tremendous pressure of popular opinion. The judiciary, whose duty it is to defend the Constitution—to fix the limits beyond which we shall not go, either in legislation or in the interpretation and the execution of the laws which Congress passes—is gradually yielding to popular opinion. You may remember that very sage remark which was made by that great modern philosopher, residing, I think, Mr. Chairman, in your own city—I refer to Mr. Martin Dooley—who said that the United States Supreme Court would never go far wrong so long as it watched the election returns and read the newspapers. [Laughter.]

Now, that was intended to be no criticism upon our great court of last resort, which has done so much for the advancement of jurisprudence, not only in this country, but in the world; but it was a great truth, stated in a homely way, that the Supreme Court of the United States will always give the benefit of a doubt to the American people. So, when that great court has been called upon to construe these different grants of powers which were made by the original thirteen States at the time the Constitution was adopted, they construe these grants a little more liberally each time, with a view of meeting the great needs and necessities of the Government.

As long ago as 1806 Henry Clay stated a great truth relative to the interpretation of the Constitution of the United States when he said:

> The Constitution, it is true, never changes; it is always the same. But the force of circumstances and the lights of experience may evolve to the fallible persons charged with its administration the fitness and necessity of a particular exercise of constructive power to-day which they did not see at a former time.

And that is true. While we have been sitting here this morning our Supreme Court has sent down a decision which very well illustrates what I have already said; and that decision, which shows the tremendous exercise of Federal power, is one of the best illustrations of what can be said with reference to it.

When we think of the power of this Congress practically to supervise all these great lines of transportation, to say to them, "You shall not consolidate these two lines which you are now owning and operating, lest by so doing it shall result in a restraint of trade or in a prohibition of competition," that is the exercise of a tremendous power; but we have exercised the great power of this Government, and are exercising it to-day, along other and different lines.

We commenced exercising that from the very commencement of the Constitution, and, if I remember correctly, it was the distinguished gentleman now occupying the chair [Mr. BOUTELL] who, from the abundance of his learning, told me that the first article upon which a duty was levied in the First Congress was, upon motion of Roger Sherman, imposing a tax of some 15 cents per gallon upon Jamaica rum, with the object in view of protecting an infant industry in New England, but nevertheless an important industry at that time, which was the manufacture of New England rum. The protection theory originated in the first session of the First Congress with the imposition of this tax to which I have referred.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Fifteen cents a gallon.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Yes; 15 cents per gallon. But we have built up our system of tariff legislation in this country with a view of fostering and stimulating certain industries. We call it incidental protection; but, nevertheless, all through our tariff legislation you find the strong hand of the Government at all times fixing those laws with a view for the greatest benefit of the manufacturing and industrial interests of the country. But it does not stop with the mere matter of imposts or duties. It extends to our internal revenue, and under the great taxing power which that gives to us we are to-day protecting certain industries and we are embarrassing their competitors.

I take it that we have not yet forgotten the action of this House only in the last Congress when we placed a tax upon all the products known as "oleomargarine." Of course we did that to raise revenue, but incidentally we did that for the protection of a competitive industry in which the Representatives in this Chamber from the farming districts were concerned.

If I mistake not, my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has before this House a bill which is along the same line with this exercise of the taxing power. At least he had that bill in the last Congress. I am not sure whether it is here now or not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me a word, in order to distinguish between those two bills?

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The shoddy bill, which your shoddy manufacturers are so much disturbed about, puts a trifling tax of perhaps a quarter of 1 per cent, for the purpose of identifying the goods, as the original oleomargarine bill did. The oleomargarine bill, which I voted against and opposed, put 10 cents a pound—a prohibitive tax—upon the production of an article of food in the interest of another article of food. One is a tax for the mere purpose of police control, for the branding of the goods. The other is a prohibitive tax, building up one industry by destroying another.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. I did not intend to criticise in any way the gentleman from Ohio. I am not sure but that I should have been with him if the bill came up for consideration. I was taking that bill as a good illustration of the great exercise of Federal power.

Now, of course you can follow the legislation of Congress, whether it has been enacted under the welfare clause of the Constitution, whether it has been enacted under the taxing power of the Constitution, or whether enacted under the control and regulation of interstate commerce, and you will find that we have been reaching out year by year a little further, and we have gone so far in this respect that our friends from that magnificent State of Iowa say that we have already gone too far and made it possible under the Wilson bill for the regulation of interstate commerce for a case of wine or a jug of whisky to walk around through that State and defy their laws which they have enacted for the regulation of their domestic affairs, and they ask us to remove the pressure of Federal power not because we have exceeded the Constitution, but because we have embarrassed the exercise of State authority.

If you will take into consideration also what we have done with a view to regulate the trusts and the combinations of this country, you will find that we have gone a long way to interfere with the industrial interests of our people. You know that the basic principle of government, upon which all government was originally founded, was for the purpose of preserving order and administering justice. That is largely the foundation of the great English Government to-day. But we have not stopped at the mere preservation of order and the administration of justice.

We have undertaken to reach out and control individual action. In this country to-day the individual in his industrial life is no longer free to do what he chooses, because whenever he attempts to oppress the weak, whenever he attempts to do those things which are not for the welfare of society, he comes in contact with the strong arm of the Federal power, exercised under the provisions of the various laws which we have passed for the regulation and the supervision of the industrial condition of our people.

Now, in my opinion, this exercise of Federal power is going to continue to go on. It is not going to stop here. If you will look over the files of the bills which are coming in here each day you will find that public opinion demands that we go even further than we have. Why, you take the bill introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNLOW], which provides for the construction of good roads throughout this country—and there is no man sitting here at the present time who has not received scores of letters calling on him to give the aid necessary for the passage of that bill.

You will find bills here for the preservation of a great forest reserve up in New England, in the State of New Hampshire, and you will find support of the proposed law coming from the far West, saying that that is a wise thing to pass that bill. On the other hand, you will find a bill for the preservation of the magnificent historical trees in the great State of California, and I have received hundreds of letters from my own district urging me to use my influence to get Federal aid to carry out that project. You will find that the people themselves are looking to the Federal Government not only for the preservation of order and the administration of justice, but for the shaping of the industrial and social condition of our people.

Now, this leads me to the consideration of that other question to which I referred a little earlier in my remarks, and that is governmental paternalism. I noticed the other day an editorial in one of the ablest papers in New England charging Congress with going over to what was called "paternalism." It said we had already gone too far, and we ought to stop; that paternalism was just as bad if not worse than socialism. Well, it is true we have gone a good way into this matter of governmental paternalism. I think that was well illustrated by the statement made by one of my colleagues the other day, that he had received a letter from a woman in his district who wrote to him, "You need not send me any Government seeds this year, but I will take in place of them a piano." [Laughter.]

Then, this morning I was shown a letter to one of the Representatives from Pennsylvania from a man who had invented a recipe to cure mad dogs, and he wanted the Government to buy it, and having bought it, to put it into a publication and give it out to the people of the United States. He was anxious that all the people should have the benefit of his great discovery, and he was anxious that the Government should publish it and distribute it among the people. We are engaging to-day some of the very best experts to write up books as to the best way of raising pigeons, the best method of raising a goat, the best way of raising all kinds of live stock. More than that, for the purpose of educating the people we are sending out to-day scores of publications.

Well, now, what is the effect of this? To my mind the effect of this paternalism is to bring the people of the country a little more directly in contact with the Government, so that they feel their dependence upon the Government. I want to make this as a proposition, Mr. Chairman, that if the United States Government were to cease the exercise of Federal power to which I have referred, and were to cease the exercise of this governmental paternalism illustrated by so many acts upon the statute books, by so many rules of the Department, that the effect of that would be to drive this country over to socialism in less than five years. We live under a form of government which can be changed at any time without a revolution.

The people of this country, acting through the ballot box, either directly or indirectly, may change every law upon the statute books; may change the Constitution of the nation and the constitution of every State, and they may do that without any revolution. They may do it by the proper exercise of the authority vested in them under the law. More than that, they may so change the Federal Constitution and the State constitution as to make it possible for the Government to take away every dollar's worth of property in this country without a cent of compensation and turn it over for the use of all the people. Now we are doing, it seems to me, the very thing which is necessary to prevent this country from being swung over to the wildest dream of Bellamy by bringing these people more closely in contact with the Government.

We expend each year some $600,000 or $700,000 for the distribution of seeds, for the distribution of shade trees, grapevines, and strawberry plants. While I do not quite agree that we are justified in doing that, when we make a gift in competition with our citizens engaged in such productions, you can not stop it. Public opinion demands it. It demands it in almost every district of this country, and every time that the Government does something for a citizen it brings that citizen a little closer to the Government. It makes the citizen a little more patriotic; and those who are coming here by the millions from those countries on the other side of the ocean, where so little is done for the citizen by the government, appreciate what appears to them to be the beneficence and helpfulness of the newly adopted nation under whose authority they have come to live.

But this leads me to the consideration of one important feature of this discussion before I close. I suppose that the United States before the close of this century, under the present growth of population and wealth, will have a population of at least 200,000,000 and a wealth of at least $300,000,000,000. Now, what is to be the policy concerning the civil service of this Government? The civil service of this Government is something that has got to be considered, and very soon considered, by the American Congress. When you take into consideration this great growth of Federal power—this great growth of paternalism—the civil branch of the Government which carries into execution the orders of the people as made through Congress has got to be considered and improved.

I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that what has occurred in the Post-Office Department is not a credit to the civil service of the United States. I say that the efficiency of many of the great departments of the Government is rapidly deteriorating. I saw the suggestion the other day make by General Ainsworth at a hearing before the House Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, in which he suggested that the true method for improvement of the civil service to carry out the great functions of government was the establishment of a national academy for the education of young men for that service. Now, to my mind, that suggestion is entitled to the most serious consideration.

When you take into consideration what those great academies—the academy at West Point and the academy at Annapolis—have done for the Army and the Navy of the United States, it is something that entitles this other suggestion to great weight. His plan was that from each district Representatives to Congress should designate one or more men to be educated by the Government to enter the Government service, the consular or diplomatic service, and fit themselves for performance of a life work in connection with the civil service of the country.

We are justly proud of the men who are educated for the military and naval service at West Point and Annapolis. That education fosters and develops patriotism; it stimulates loyalty to duty; it makes them feel that they are a part of the governmental machine, with a duty not only to protect and defend the Government, but to advance its interests at all times. They stand ready to give to the country the best service of which they are able, and even to surrender up their lives in behalf of the country to which they are intensely devoted.

The men in our civil service to-day are not of the same character and capacity. Many of them have entered the service after having made a failure in some other undertaking. To them a Government position is a mere opportunity to earn a living. They are doing exactly what the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] said the other day, "They are toadying to their chiefs."

They are attempting to get some Member of Congress to indorse them for promotion in violation of existing law. We have nothing of that in the Army or the Navy. The young man who goes into the Army or the Navy, if he has been a graduate of one of the great national academies, is there to take his promotion upon merit, and upon merit alone.

Now, to my mind, this is one of the questions that must invite our attention in the near future. We have reached the point to-day under the civil service where the employees of the Government are becoming less and less efficient each year. Some one has said that we never can pension these men in the civil service. Let me say to you that we are pensioning these men to-day. Let anyone go down to one of the old Departments and see these elderly men and women who come down each morning, sick and infirm, and ought to be at home, who are holding on simply to keep their names on the pay roll. These people are on the pension list to-day. Some radical reform has got to be made in order to reach this situation, which is becoming more serious each day.

Now, the discussion of this bill, Mr. Chairman, and this investigation can not fail to impress every Member of this House with the great country in which we live, with the tremendous increasing population and wealth of the century, nor can it fail to impress us that we belong to the most masterful race the world has ever seen. [Applause.] More than that, that this masterful race under these free institutions is going to forge to the front; this nation is going to exercise greater power each year. You remember that when Jefferson brought about the Louisiana purchase he believed that he had exceeded his powers under the Federal Constitution.

But to-day we have within our possession Alaska; that beautiful island of Porto Rico, so ably represented upon this floor by my distinguished friend on my left [applause]; we have Hawaii, also represented upon this floor; and we have those islands away out in the Orient, over which the Stars and Stripes float to-day as emblematic of this tremendous power.

The future, to my mind, is the future of a great people, which each year will advance the standard of civilization and each year will advance in influence and power. Our influence will not be confined to this side of the Atlantic. Our influence will not be confined to the limits of the United States, but it is to make its visible impress in this century upon the entire civilization of the globe. [Applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the gentleman from Tennessee now occupy some of his time.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, we are safely over the turmoil of last week, the House membership is at last composed, and it may not be out of order at this time to review for a few moments the causes that led to the incidents of last week's very animated debate. I assume that this House desires to be correct in its conclusions at all times. I assume that the House will not be satisfied finally with the investigation directed practically by the Post-Office Department against the membership of this House when there is standing before us the glaring evidence of all manner of fraud and corruption and thievery committed in that Post-Office Department. I believe, with these facts before us, that the House will desire ultimately, having been relieved from the hysteria of last week, to look into this great Department of the Government and right things there.

Let us look for a few moments to the condition we have gotten the House into and the attitude the membership of this House occupies to-day before the country. It will be remembered that early in the session, on application of the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, this House, after much debate and a division, finally passed a resolution authorizing the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to demand from the Department the evidences that were before that Department of wrongdoing therein. This was deemed essential for the purpose of properly preparing the supply bill now under consideration.

This testimony was called for by the committee. It was brought to the committee under the signature of the Postmaster-General. It was used in the preparation of that bill. The Hay resolution, which was last week considered, was then before the committee. When the committee took up that resolution it was found that there was already before it all of the facts which they deemed essential to be reported under the privileged character of that resolution.

Those facts were sent there by the Department itself. The committee were of the opinion that the facts as presented ought not to be edited by the committee. They did not feel that they had any authority to select eight or ten or a dozen gentlemen, who had evidently technically violated the law, and say, "These men are guilty," and that the balance, who had been practically charged in this indictment of the Post-Office Department, were not guilty. The Committee had no power vested in it by this House at any time to sit in judgment on the membership of the House. It felt that in wisdom and in justice to the country and to the House it had no right to suppress the indictment that the Department had brought against the membership of the House.

There was, therefore, but one thing to do; it was to report the manner of conducting business in the Department by which and under which the various communications referred to in this report found their way into the Department, and then to report to the House the facts as presented by the Department, and let the House and the country judge of the sufficiency of the charge against the membership of the House, with the expression of opinion alone on the part of the committee that Members of the House were not guilty of any moral turpitude. That is the substance of that report.

When that report reached here it was ascertained at once that the House was wild, that it was chafing under the charges brought by the Department against it. The committee was censured for doing the thing which alone it could do—presenting the facts to the House. And, then, what is the attitude of the House?

Mr. MARSHALL. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

Mr. MARSHALL. I dislike very much to interrupt the gentleman. I agree with him fully that it was perfectly proper for the committee to bring in here the report of General Bristow in full, but I would like the gentleman to answer why the committee, in their letter of January 23, called for information relative to the offices where allowances had been discontinued. I can not understand what purpose Congress or the people or the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads could have in asking for cases where the allowances had been reduced in the regular course of business and never had been in excess of the regulations of the Department.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman will observe that the committee did not ask for that exact statement, but, as I recollect, the original report of General Bristow did refer to those cases, and referred to them in a manner that was not complimentary by any means to the membership of the House.

Mr. MARSHALL. General Bristow in no report ever referred to the cases which the Post-Office Committee asked for. The cases that he referred to were cases where there had been an excess——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. MARSHALL. But in over 800 of the 900 cases listed here there was at no time an excess. Yet it has gone out to the world that in these cases the reductions were made necessary because of some Congressmen's interference, when, as a matter of fact, those reductions were made in the ordinary course of business, and there was never any excess.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I do not know whether the chairman in his letter intended to go so far as the answer implied or not—I hardly think he did—but General Bristow himself was before that committee, and inquiries were put to him all along the line and to his subordinates who were before the committee, and in reply generally to the inquiries and to the letter presented by the Post-Office Committee those things were brought in.

I agree fully with the gentleman that there was nothing in them, and I think it would have been best perhaps if they had not been brought here; but being here, being before the committee, it was the duty of the committee to present the facts to the House. The people are intelligent. They see that there is nothing wrong on the statement of the facts—no wrong to be imputed to the membership of this House. They will reach that conclusion which you and I must also reach, that it was a part of the general dragnet of the Department to implicate this House and prevent the House from an investigation of that Department.

Mr. MARSHALL. If it seemed best on the part of the committee for the committee to bring those more than 800 cases in here after having called for a lot of gratuitous information, it would seem they ought at least to have taken the precaution to separate the sheep from the goats and make the report fairly intelligible to the public.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I think not, because the committee were not invested with any power to sit in judgment. They had asked General Bristow to present to that committee those things which he said Congressmen had done in violation of law or the regulations of the Department. The General presented that as a part of his indictment. I think the demurrer is very well sustained to that part of the indictment, and I think it is possible that the committee might have left that out; but the gentleman will see at once in what an attitude this committee would have been if it had suppressed a single fact offered by way of indictment against this House, if it had undertaken to sit in judgment where the House had not given it power to sit. If the committee had edited the report, your reply to that committee would have been: "You have exceeded your authority; you have suppressed facts; there are things there that this House ought to know that you have prevented it from knowing," and you would have presented to the country the situation that the committee had suppressed those things in the suppression of which they were interested. Therefore it was wise that the committee should do exactly as it did.

And, Mr. Chairman, while I am not called upon and would not improperly pass judgment upon the propriety of the action of the House, yet, with all respect to the House, I do think that when a proposition has been submitted here for an investigation of the Department, coupled with a further investigation as to the conduct of membership in connection with that Department where fraud had been committed, it should have been accepted. The House at least could have preserved the right to defend its honor and its integrity by making an investigation of those who had charged that crime against the House, when there was no evidence of guilt on the part of the House, except possibly a few technical cases, and when the records showed guilt on the part of the Department.

Mr. OTJEN. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman gets too far from this subject, I should like to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. OTJEN. I would like to ask you this question: Is it not substantially true that the Post-Office Department furnished only that evidence which was called for in the three letters of the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I think that is substantially true; yes. The House, of course, will observe the impropriety of this committee sitting in judgment without authority to do so and the propriety of this committee submitting the facts to the House, that the House might judge and the country might judge the validity of those charges.

Mr. OTJEN. May I ask you one further question: Did the committee know that the chairman had made this kind of a request as appears in these three letters to the Post-Office Department?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes; I suppose the committee generally knew so. I do not suppose that the committee examined with any particular care to see the exact language of the chairman's request. It was only to cover the general proposition involved.

But, as I was about to remark, Mr. Chairman, this House did this very strange thing: When this committee practically exculpated this House and presented facts that inculpated the Department we find the House ready, willing, and active to demand a further investigation of itself, when the very committee to whom the question had been submitted had presented facts which, in my judgment, did not require such action on the part of the House. In other words, you yield to the demand of a Department that charges you with crime, without giving proof of it, further to investigate yourselves, and you decline the proposition of the minority to investigate a Department that is confessedly reeking with crime and corruption.

Now, the minority of this committee are not anxious to press upon the House questions so humiliating and so mortifying not merely to the House but to the country at large; but we do feel that the House, under a technical point of order, having prevented an investigation of the Department, an investigation should still be had if it can be had under any method of parliamentary procedure in this body.

The minority of the committee, therefore, will present to the House for consideration another proposition, not coupled with privileged matter, as the one was a day or two since, but nonprivileged in its character, that will be presented under a section of this bill which we regard as the appropriate section for its presentation—that section of the bill which provides $85,000 for various miscellaneous matters, and further provides that out of that sum a given amount of money shall be used by the Postmaster-General in the investigation of frauds committed against the postal laws and for services in the apprehension of criminals.

I therefore give notice now, in order that the House may know just what the minority propose, that we shall insist to the last moment, for the honor of the House and for the honor of the Department and of the country, that an investigation be had in that Department; and when the section that I refer to is reached, I shall offer an amendment, which I will ask the Clerk now to read from the desk in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend as follows:

On page 22, line 20, strike out "$85,000" and insert "$112,000."

On page 22, in line 21, after the word "exceed," strike out the following: "$2,000 may be expended, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General," and insert "$17,000 shall be expended, or so much thereof as may be necessary, by the Postmaster-General."

After the word "criminals," in line 25, on page 22, add the following: "Provided further, That the Postmaster-General shall expend said sum of money, or so much thereof as is necessary, in the payment of clerks, stenographers, accountants, and detectives, and for other necessary expenses for the purpose of securing information concerning the violation of the postal laws and for services and information looking toward the apprehension of criminals guilty of crimes committed in or in connection with the Post-Office Department. The examination of all witnesses, records, and accounts for this purpose shall be conducted before a select committee of eight, five of whom shall be Members of the House, to be appointed by the Speaker, and three of whom shall be Senators appointed by the President of the Senate, and this committee shall have full power to send for persons and papers and enforce the production of the same, to examine witnesses under oath, to sit during the sessions of the House and Senate, and to exercise all functions necessary to complete investigation of all frauds and irregularities alleged to exist in said Department, and the Postmaster-General shall render to said committee all necessary assistance. And said committee shall report the result of its investigation to Congress as soon as practicable, with such recommendations as to it may seem advisable;" so that the section as amended shall read as follows:

"For salaries of clerks and laborers at division headquarters, miscellaneous expenses at division headquarters, traveling expenses of inspectors without per diem, and of inspectors in charge, expenses incurred by field inspectors not covered by per diem allowance, and traveling expenses of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General and chief post-office inspector, $112,000: Provided, That of the amount herein appropriated not to exceed $17,000 shall be expended, or so much thereof as may be necessary, by the Postmaster-General for the purpose of securing information concerning violations of the postal laws, and for services and information looking toward the apprehension of criminals: Provided further, That the Postmaster-General shall expend said sum of money, or so much thereof as is necessary, in the payment of clerks, stenographers, accountants, and detectives, and for other necessary expenses for the purpose of securing information concerning the violation of the postal laws, and for services and information looking toward the apprehension of criminals guilty of crimes committed in or in connection with the Post-Office Department. The examination of all witnesses, records, and accounts for this purpose shall be conducted before a select committee of eight, five of whom shall be Members of the House, to be appointed by the Speaker, and three of whom shall be Senators appointed by the President of the Senate, and this committee shall have full power to send for persons and papers and to enforce the production of the same, to examine witnesses under oath, to sit during the sessions of the House and Senate, and to exercise all functions necessary to complete investigation of all frauds and irregularities alleged to exist in said Department, and the Postmaster-General shall render to said committee all necessary assistance. And said committee shall report the result of its investigation to Congress as soon as practicable, with such recommendations as to it may seem advisable."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That amendment will be offered, Mr. Chairman, for several reasons. If it be true that no other fraud has been committed in that Department of the Government than that which has already been investigated in the First Assistant Postmaster-General's office, the country ought to know that fact and that Department ought to be exculpated, because we can not afford to leave the stain of dishonor that now rests upon that great Department if it be not guilty. Again, if it be guilty, the House, the immediate representative of the people of the United States, can not afford, for partisan or any other reason, for one moment to shield or protect that Department or anyone connected with it in the violation of the laws of the country and the misappropriation of the funds which this Congress gives for the conduct of the Post-Office Department. The question then will be presented fairly to you: "Do you want to protect the Department in its innocence? Do you want to have the criminals punished there if they are guilty?" The investigation will no doubt develop the weaknesses in the Department, and a proper remedy can be applied to prevent frauds hereafter.

We ought to meet this question in a nonpartisan spirit. I am not prepared to say that because the men who conduct that Department happen to entertain different political views from those which I entertain that therefore they are to be suspicioned, investigated, and punished. Far from it. It is simply a question of common honesty. The investigation should be made. We ought to divest it of all political character; and while the result, if the Department is found guilty, will be to convince the country that the Republican party has been derelict in the discharge of its duty and not entitled to exercise power, the result can not be to stain that party with crime and dishonor, as the result surely will be if you fail to investigate, in the light of the charges now made against that Department, generally believed to be true and known in many instances to be true.

For the good of the Department, for the good of the House, for the good of the country, the minority will present to you the consideration of that question at the appropriate place in this bill.

I will not now discuss the question as to whether the proposed amendment will be subject to a point of order or not, because if anybody in this House is further willing to shield the Administration behind a point of order, behind a technical objection, they are welcome to do so, for the country will then know that you approve of the frauds and the villainies in this Department of the Government. [Applause.]

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] thirty-five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] is recognized for thirty-five minutes.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, taking advantage of the latitude permitted for discussion, I want to say something on the political conditions as they formerly existed and now exist in the Southern States.

The position of the South in the political history of the Republic has been a peculiar and an anomalous one.

Previous to the civil war there was no part of the country where political questions were more thoroughly studied, where parties were more evenly divided, and statesmanship unfettered by sectionalism seemed to have reached its fullest fruition and to produce its richest results.

Of the thirteen original States forming the Union, the four Southern States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia held a commanding place in the great work of government building. At the beginning of the year 1861 there were thirty-two States which constituted the American Union, of which there were eleven seceding Southern States, and two—Maryland and Kentucky—which did not leave the Union, but sympathized with the southern cause.

From 1789 to 1861, seventy-two years of the life of the Republic, fifteen Presidents had been chosen, nine of whom—Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Jackson, William H. Harrison, Tyler, Polk, and Taylor—came from the Southern States of Virginia and Tennessee, the length of whose combined service was forty-nine years, while the elder and younger Adams came from Massachusetts, Van Buren from New York, Fillmore from New York, Pierce from New Hampshire, and Buchanan from Pennsylvania, with a combined service of twenty-three years.

During this period there were fourteen Vice-Presidents of the United States, six of whom were from Southern States.

We also find that of the thirty-six justices of the Supreme Court appointed during this time twenty-one were southern men, and of the four Chief Justices, three were from the South.

There were twenty Secretaries of State from 1789 to 1861, twelve of whom were from the South.

There were twenty-three Secretaries of the Treasury, eight of whom were from the South.

Of the thirty-two Secretaries of War, sixteen were southern men.

The first Secretary of the Interior was appointed by Taylor in 1849. From that time to 1861 there had been six Secretaries appointed, three of whom were from the South.

There were twenty-five Secretaries of the Navy, thirteen of whom were from the South.

The office of Secretary of Agriculture was not created until 1889, and the first appointment was made by President Cleveland in that year.

Of the nineteen Postmasters-General, six were from the South.

There were twenty-seven Attorneys-General, and fifteen were from the Southern States.

There were twenty-seven Speakers of the House, twelve of whom were southern men.

Of the twenty-four diplomatic representatives and chargé d'affaires to Great Britain, six were from the South.

Of the thirty-three representatives to France, eighteen were from the South.

Of the nine representatives to Austria, three were from the South.

Of the twenty representatives to Russia, eight were southern men.

There were no ministers to Germany previous to 1871, at which time the first was appointed by President Grant.

There were no ministers to Italy previous to 1861, when the first was appointed by President Lincoln.

There were twenty representatives to the Spanish court, of which twelve were from the Southern States.

The first half of the period from 1789 to 1861 was one of momentous events, in which the experiment of self-government was tried; great States were admitted into the Union, and the principles of republican liberty fixed on the American Continent.

In these fruitful and eventful years the influence of the southern man on the history of his country can not be overestimated. Washington, a Virginian, is described by the English historian Green as the "grandest figure who ever stood in the forefront of a nation's life."

Then there was Jefferson, the author of the Declaration of Independence and the first statutes for religious liberty passed in this country and the reach of whose broad statesmanship has been the wonder and admiration of all mankind.

James Madison was called the "Father of the Constitution," and John Marshall, the greatest judge who ever adorned the bench of any land, was for thirty-four years the expounder of its principles and fixed forever its vigor and soul on the jurisprudence of his country.

All down the line in statesmanship, diplomacy, and military achievement the names of southern men were thick on the roll of honor. [Applause.]

It was during the Administration of southern men as Presidents that vast territorial domain was acquired, out of which States and Territories have been erected and constitutional government ordained for the people.

In a speech made in the Senate of the United States in 1850 by Salmon P. Chase, then a Senator from Ohio and afterwards Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, the following colloquy occurred:

Mr. CHASE. Mr. President, I do not know that any monument has been erected over the grave of Jefferson in Virginia.

Mr. MASON. There is—a granite obelisk.

Mr. CHASE. I am glad to hear it. No monumental marble bears a nobler name.

Mr. SEWARD. The inscription is: "Here was buried Thomas Jefferson, Author of the Declaration of American Independence, of the Statute of Virginia for Religious Freedom, and Father of the University of Virginia."

Mr. CHASE. It is an appropriate inscription and worthily commemorates distinguished services. But, Mr. President, if a stranger from some foreign land should ask me for the monument of Jefferson, I would not take him to Virginia and bid him look on a granite obelisk, however admirable in its proportions or its inscriptions. I would ask him to accompany me beyond the Alleghenies, into the midst of the broad Northwest, and would say to him:

"Si monumentum quæris circumspice!"

Behold on every side his monument. These thronged cities; these flourishing villages; these cultivated fields; these million happy homes of prosperous freemen; these churches; these schools; these asylums for the unfortunate and the helpless; these institutions of education, religion, and humanity; these great States, great in their present resources, but greater far in the mighty energies by which the resources of the future are to be developed; these, these are the monument of Jefferson.

[Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have called attention to some of the achievements of southern men before the civil war, when both North and South were divided upon national, not sectional, questions; when the forum was one of free discussion, and before the black pall of universal negro suffrage had settled upon the South, paralyzing her energies and baffling the aspirations of her people. Since the war all this glorious record has been reversed, and the South for forty years has been a political pariah.

A blight has fallen upon the fair tree which before had flowered and fruited in such magnificent luxuriance.

Since the civil war there has been neither a President nor Vice-President elected or nominated by either political party from the Southern States.

Of the fourteen Secretaries of State appointed since 1865, none have been from the South.

Of the seventeen Secretaries of the Treasury, two were from the South.

Of the nineteen Secretaries of War, none were from the South.

Of the sixteen Secretaries of the Interior, two were from the South.

Of the twelve Secretaries of the Navy, two were from the South.

Of the four Secretaries of Agriculture, none were from the South.

Of the twenty Postmasters-General, five were from the South.

Of the eighteen Attorneys-General, three were from the South.

Of the eleven Speakers of the House, two were from the South.

Of the twenty members of the Supreme Court, five were from the South.

Of the thirteen ambassadors, ministers, and chargé d'affaires to Great Britain, not one was from a Southern State. Of the ten to France, only two were from the South. Of the nineteen to Austria-Hungary, three only were from the South. Of the twenty to Russia, three only were from the South. Of the sixteen to Germany, none were from the South. Of the eighteen to Italy, none were from the South. And of the sixteen to Spain, two were from the South.

To-day there is not one Cabinet officer or head of Department and not one ambassador or minister to any European court from any Southern State.

And this enumeration, meager as it is, of southern representation, must be still further reduced when it is considered that the majority of those accredited from the South were either northern men who came South after the war or were selected because of their hostility to the southern cause.

The only cases in the desert of nonrepresentation which has been the unhappy lot of the Southern States since the termination of the civil war will be found in the two Administrations of Grover Cleveland. During the eight years of his service he never hesitated to go to the South for his advisers and to represent the nation abroad or the majesty of the law at home.

He named John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky, Secretary of the Treasury; L. Q. C. Lamar, of Mississippi, and afterwards Hoke Smith, of Georgia, Secretaries of the Interior; Hilary A. Herbert, of Alabama, as Secretary of the Navy; and Augustus H. Garland, of Arkansas, as Attorney-General. He appointed Edward D. White, of Louisiana, and L. Q. C. Lamar, of Mississippi, who dignified and adorned every position which he ever held, as justices of the Supreme Court of the United States. He appointed Robert McLane, of Maryland, as minister, and James B. Eustis, of Louisiana, ambassador to France. He named A. M. Kiely, of Virginia, and Alexander R. Lawton, of Georgia, ministers to Austria; Clifton R. Breckinridge, of Arkansas, to Russia; and J. L. M. Curry, of Virginia, and Hannis Taylor, of Alabama, to the court of Spain.

Well may it be recalled, during Mr. Cleveland's first term, how the northern press teemed with fierce denunciations of southern men, and the awful spectacle was exhibited to the North of the South again being in the saddle; but Cleveland withstood this storm of protest, as he has withstood every other storm that has gathered about his head, and, in my opinion, in his unreserved recognition of southern men he did more to destroy sectionalism than any other single man has ever accomplished, for his appointees bore the responsibilities of high public station at home and abroad with honor and dignity and with the single purpose of the common good for the common country.

I do not pretend to be the advocate of Mr. Cleveland, nor do I think the time has come when his political eulogy should be pronounced, but if he made mistakes those mistakes were not against the interest of southern people, and whatever they were they are like specks on the sun of his great character, intense patriotism, and unblemished honor. [Loud applause.]

It has always been a fact that the South was perfectly loyal to the Union since the surrender. The difficulty was either that the North did not know this fact or would not admit it for political reasons.

Next to Cleveland, I think the man who did more to bring about this realization was the lamented McKinley, and as a southern man and an American I pause to lay a tribute on his tomb. [Applause.] His varied and extensive knowledge of men and conditions, gathered from eighteen years' experience as a legislator in the House of Representatives, and in other fields to which his people called him, together with his kindliness of nature and integrity of purpose, made him the fitting evangel of peace and good will between the sections which he carried across the continent, and which he practiced in thought, word, and deed. Well do I recall the occasion of Mr. McKinley's visit to Memphis in the spring before his assassination. His reception was generous and sincere, and I can see now the remnant of Company A, grizzled Confederate veterans, with their muskets and uniforms of gray, as they flanked his carriage on both sides and for more than a mile marched as his escort of honor. [Applause.]

There seems to be no suffering or tragedy in life that does not bear its balm, or carry its blessing; so when this great American fell in the plenitude of his power and usefulness, and "gave his honors to the world again, his blessed part to Heaven, and slept in peace," I think that all the people at last realized, as they had never done before, that patriotism was not cribbed or confined by geographical lines of boundary, but spread out and reached to the extremest limits of the Republic, and is the inspiration of us all in the persistent purpose to make this country the best on earth and the home of liberty forever. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the reason for the decrease of the South in political power is not difficult to discover.

It was not the war that kept sectional antagonism alive so long, for the war was fought by brave men on both sides, and a decade under ordinary conditions would have witnessed the end of partisan feeling, but it was universal negro suffrage which provoked a misguided northern feeling and ate its way like a corroding canker to the very heart of the southern people.

It has been a plague on both the houses, North and South. It explains why the Republican party has so completely ignored those of its own political faith in the South, and why the Democratic party, with the acquiescence of the southern people, has not offered a candidate from any Southern State for the highest elective offices in the gift of the people, though always having a majority of the electoral vote.

The fifteenth amendment to the Constitution was conceived in an hour of passion and designed as an act of vengeance.

It was a cruel penalty inflicted by an inflamed foe upon a fallen and beaten adversary. It chained the South to a corpse.

It created and held prominent false and meretricious issues before the country.

It was a gift which the negro did not know how to intelligently use, and its only effect has been to breed false notions of social equality and to provoke swift retribution and bloody violence.

Who does not now believe that his life, liberty, and property, which every good man wishes him to enjoy, would have been more secure without than with political equality?

With all the black men, in the majority in some States and in many particular localities, led by unscrupulous adventurers, intent on public plunder and using the negro as a tool, what was more reasonable or necessary for self-preservation than for all southern men to ally themselves with another party?

Before the war the South was the storm center of political activity, where issues were discussed upon a high plane, so necessary in a republican government and for the development of a high order of statesmanship.

It has been suggested why not attempt to divide the negroes politically; but this would have been a hopeless and ruinous task. Had they been open to reason, which they were not, still the South could not yield the vital principle for which it always stood, nor did it dare by encouraging political to invite ultimate social equality, for it is apparent that if the white people of the South were divided politically and the negroes were likewise divided the negro vote would decide nearly all the political contests; and thus brought in close communion the inevitable end would have been the utter ruin and confusion of both the races.

No matter what the political opinions of southern white men might have been on national questions, or however much they may have divided under different conditions, their votes went massed for the white man and civilization against the black man and ruin.

The unspeakable dread and horror of the time when political equality would obliterate the lines which mark the boundaries of the races has nerved and sustained the southern man through every vicissitude of fortune and carried him safely through every ordeal which vexed the temper and tried the souls of men.

At Appomattox the Confederate soldier surrendered his arms and renewed his vows to the Union. He returned to a desolated land and found his old slaves his political masters.

Without aid or bounty, in proud and incorruptible poverty, true to himself and false to none, he has lived and will die. He is now hurrying to the silence of the shadows which lay thick and heavy across the river, and soon will join the comrades who have gone before at the ghostly camp fires of the bivouac of the dead.

And when the last soldier in gray shall sleep, the impartial historian will tell of his matchless valor on the battlefield, but will write of the struggle he made for his home and fireside as the crowning act and the noblest of a drama so full of pathos, so set with high courage, so rich in imperishable honor. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to indulge in any cheap abuse of the negro. He has many kindly qualities, and I am acquainted with self-respecting colored men who are honorable and useful citizens and have the confidence of the people with whom they live.

Nor shall I recall atrocities in the North as a justification for atrocities in the South. They are to be deplored whenever they occur, but the fact remains that like conditions will produce like results in Ohio as in Texas, and I believe that an equal number of negroes are safer in the South than they can be in the North, for there the white people are more lenient with their frailties and charitable to their faults.

That the South was justified in adopting the only alternative presented for self-preservation is being understood and admitted by the intelligence of the entire country.

Time has accomplished much, and the passing years have brought an unmistakable message.

The presence in increasing numbers of negroes in the North, the influx of northern men to the South, closer intercommunication between the sections, concrete decisions by the Supreme Court sustaining the reserved powers of the States, and the Spanish-American war have all been contributing factors to a clear understanding and a more rational sentiment on the vexed question of negro suffrage.

And the Republican party itself finally approved the doctrine that inferior people had no right to political equality with the civilized white race when it declared that American States should never be made of the Philippine Islands, and the people thereof, though Christian Malays, with more intelligence and a much higher conception of the arts of civilization than the negro ever had, who had never been the slaves of any master, were unfitted for American citizenship and are left unclothed with the elective franchise to be tutored, controlled, and governed by arbitrary power.

From force bills no longer discussed, from monstrous and unnatural political and social relations proposed in passion and abandoned in the day of cool judgment, is a far but inspiring cry.

The amalgamation theory of Wendell Phillips and the recent notable declaration by Elihu Root that universal negro suffrage was a mistake and has been a failure are monuments marking stupendous changes, and set so high that the student of history is blind who does not see and comprehend.

This change, Mr. Chairman, while of immense value to the whole country, is of peculiar interest to the South, which has so long labored under the load of misrepresentation and borne the cruel burden which negro suffrage imposed.

It opens the door of opportunity for a reentrance on the stage of national politics, from which she has been too long excluded.

The day has come for the South to assert her political independence and resume her historical place in the Union.

The hour is now for the South to lift the mortgage on her electoral votes, which she has paid to the uttermost farthing.

The spectacle of a proud people who were willing to forfeit all claims to the highest offices in the country has been all along discouraging and dispiriting, and, in my opinion, not always necessary.

I do not think that to nominate a Southern man for the Presidency would change one electoral vote against the Democratic party. For one, I am weary of hearing the constant and subservient iteration that the South is for any man whom the North may name for President.

It is an injustice to the South and a reflection upon the intelligence and patriotism of the northern Democracy.

Why should John G. Carlisle, the distinguished ex-Speaker of this House and Secretary of the Treasury, be proscribed because he comes from Kentucky?

Why should the leader of the Democratic minority upon this floor, who has exhibited such conspicuous ability and grasp of public questions, be barred from the Presidency because he lives in the State of Mississippi? [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Why should the eminent Texan, formerly the leader of the Democratic minority, whose intellect is of the first order, and whose knowledge and exposition of Democratic principles and devotion to high political ideals has given him a deserved reputation, not aspire to the chief office in the gift of the people? [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The question should no longer be from what State or section a possible nominee of the Democratic convention should hail, but should solely be what are his qualifications, what his worth, as measured by the high office to which he aspires.

The Democracy and the country need a man of broad Americanism, of high personal standards, whose ambition will be subordinated to the public weal; who is for honest taxation and the legitimate expenditure of public money; who believes in constitutional government and is an implacable foe to executive encroachments at home and abroad.

Such a man can be the next president of the United States, no matter what his name or from whence he comes. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I yield forty-five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, the demand for better postal facilities is one of the indications of the high state of intelligence and civilization of the present age. No item in this bill is of greater importance or has better reason for being contained therein than the appropriation for the continuance and extension of the rural free-delivery service.

It is within the memory of those who still live that at one time it cost 25 cents for the transmittal of one letter a distance of 400 miles. In our own land of cheap postage the time was when the farmer's wife was compelled to part with a week's saving of butter and eggs in order to send a letter to her home in the East or to her adventurous boy in the West. In those days the postmaster at the crossroads grocery store frequently received more than a bushel of wheat for the necessary postage on one ordinary letter.

From this almost chaotic state we have steadily and gradually advanced until the present high state of efficiency of our postal facilities is not only desirable but is absolutely necessary for our prosperity, comfort, and happiness.

The delivery of mail outside of the regular post-offices was first undertaken, and quite naturally so, I think, in the cities, and yet it must be admitted and can be readily seen that the people accommodated were not so much in need of and could not receive as much benefit from free delivery as the people in the remote country districts.

It is a matter of comparatively small consequence for a resident of a city or town to be saved a walk of a few blocks to the post-office for the purpose of getting his mail. In the case of the farmer, however, who lives six or eight miles in the country, and who would have to drive that distance over country roads to get his mail, it is not only a great accommodation but a great saving of time and money to have his mail delivered at his front gate.

In the case of the city delivery the patron does not receive his mail on an average as soon as though he himself went to the post-office and made personal inquiry. The resident of the free-delivery districts in cities and towns will therefore dispatch and receive few, if any, more letters on account of the delivery of mail at his residence. The additional expense, therefore, caused by free city delivery is not compensated by any additional revenue in postal receipts. On the other hand, the delivery of mail in the rural districts causes a vast amount of increase in postal revenue.

The farmer in such cases receives his mail sooner and answers it more promptly. He receives more mail and writes more letters. The installation of this service not only adds to the business, the happiness, and the comfort of the farmer, but it vastly increases the revenue of the Post-Office Department. From careful comparisons that have been made at different times it is shown that the increase of business caused by the establishment of rural free delivery has been from 25 to 50 per cent. This increase has not been spasmodic or temporary, but seems to be permanent and increasing from year to year, and those best posted on the subject and who have made careful study of the system are of the opinion that the time will come at no distant day when it will be self-sustaining.

I would not take away or curtail the establishment of free delivery in cities and towns, but on the other hand would increase such service wherever it can be economically done, and yet it seems to me that when we take into consideration the benefits to be derived from the service and the increase of revenue to be added to the receipts it must be conceded that in the extension of the free-delivery service the farmer and the resident in the rural district is entitled to the first and highest consideration.

The free delivery of mail to the rural population in the United States is of comparatively recent origin, and yet it has been experimented with and installed in Great Britain and other European countries for quite a number of years. A comparison, however, between our efforts in this direction and the experiments made by foreign nations is of but little value, for the reason that the rural population of our country are better educated and of a higher moral and social nature than the farmers of foreign lands, and a failure of the system in any other country is no reason why it will not be successful here.

The inauguration of rural free delivery in the United States was beset with many difficulties. In its infancy it was pounced upon by the Democratic party, a party that has an unbroken history of never missing an opportunity to try to throttle the life of every infant industry that may be so unfortunate as to meet it upon the great highway of progress. In making appropriations for the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, the sum of $10,000 was appropriated for the purpose of making an experiment in the rural free delivery of mail.

This money was available from and after the 1st day of July, 1893. The country was at that time under a Democratic Administration. The Post-Office Department, headed by the Democratic Postmaster-General, was not only opposed to rural free delivery, but it refused and neglected to make any experiments or to institute any rural free-delivery routes. As an excuse for this failure and neglect to obey the mandates of the law the Assistant Postmaster-General, in his report transmitted to Congress in December, 1893, expressed strong views against rural free delivery and the Postmaster-General of this same Democratic Administration approved these views, and in his report to this same Congress spoke of rural free delivery as follows:

> Although it was provided by Congress in the appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, that $10,000 should be devoted, at the discretion of the Postmaster-General, to testing the feasibility of establishing a system of free delivery in rural districts, it has been found impossible, by reason of the pressure of more important questions, for the officers having that subject in charge to give the subject the study and consideration that it demands, much less to establish such rural free delivery. It was soon discovered, furthermore, that the appropriation for this experiment is not at all sufficient for thorough and reliable tests, for, in order to give the rural free-delivery system a fair and thorough trial, tests would have to be made in many localities, differing, necessarily, in density of population, topography, class of interests, and condition of highways and thoroughfares. To inaugurate a system of rural free delivery, it would require an appropriation of at least $20,000,000.
> I therefore adopt the opinion of the First Assistant Postmaster-General that the Department would not be warranted in burdening the people with such a great expense, when it can more properly, adequately, and economically meet the requirements of postal extension by widening its scope along reasonable and conservative lines and by establishing additional post-offices wherever the communities are justified in asking for them.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is it not true also that before this report Postmaster-General Wanamaker, in 1892, recommended strongly this service?

Mr. NORRIS. I think it is. I think the recommendation was made by the Republican Postmaster-General that preceded this Democratic one.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, is it not a fact that instead of Postmaster-General Wanamaker recommending the rural free-delivery service in the country he simply recommended an extension of the service to villages and smaller towns?

Mr. NORRIS. My recollection is that he recommended both rural free delivery and an extension in the cities and in towns.

Mr. CANDLER. The city delivery had been in existence ever since 1863.

Mr. NORRIS. But a different class of cities were added. The experiments were being tried at that time in towns with a population of 10,000; I think that is the correct number.

Mr. CANDLER. Free delivery in cities was inaugurated in 1863, and what Postmaster-General Wanamaker recommended was that smaller towns should be taken into consideration and free delivery extended to them that were at that time included in city delivery.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it was.

Mr. CANDLER. But his recommendation did not go to the extent of recommending that it take in the country at large.

Mr. NORRIS. It may be that that is his recommendation—I am not sure as to that—and it may be that it did not extend any further than the smaller class of cities already under the law and to those recommended to be put under free delivery.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I want to say to the gentleman, as I have investigated the question, that I am satisfied that Postmaster-General Wanamaker's recommendation only extended to the suburbs of the cities and towns.

Mr. NORRIS. All right.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. But it did not in any way extend to the rural free delivery in country places as we now know it.

Mr. NORRIS. That may be. I confess I did not look to Postmaster-General Wanamaker's recommendation; but the gentleman from Kansas seems to be of opinion that he had included that, and it was my idea that he did in connection with the extension of the free delivery to the smaller cities.

It will be observed that the Postmaster-General justifies his neglect on two grounds, viz: First, that the Department could not attend to the wants and demands of the farmers of our great country on account of more important business, and, second, that the appropriation was too small. The statement of the first defense is its own sufficient answer.

The reasonable and just demands of 40,000,000 of our people, the very bone and sinew of our Republic, were thus ruthlessly cast aside by a wave of the hand of this great Democratic Postmaster-General on the false ground that he had more important business to attend to. I will show later that the second ground was not only untrue, but that as a matter of fact when the experiment was finally made a few years later by this same Administration, an amount less than $10,000 was used in making it.

Not only was the Administration against rural free delivery, but this Democratic opposition included the other Democratic branches of our National Government. The House of Representatives was also Democratic at that time, and on February 27, 1894, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads in reporting to the House the annual post-office appropriation bill, used the following language in reference to rural free delivery:

> Although it was provided by Congress in the appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, that $10,000 should be devoted, at the discretion of the Postmaster-General, to testing the feasibility of establishing a system of free delivery in rural districts, it has been found impossible, by reason of the pressure of more important questions, for the officers having that subject in charge to give the subject the study and consideration that it demands, much less to establish such rural free delivery. It was soon discovered, furthermore, that the appropriation for this experiment is not at all sufficient for thorough and reliable tests; for, in order to give the rural free-delivery system a fair and thorough trial, tests would have to be made in many localities, differing, necessarily, in density of population, topography, class of interests, and condition of highways and thoroughfares. To inaugurate a system of rural free delivery it would require an appropriation of at least $20,000,000.
> The Postmaster-General, therefore, adopts the opinion of the First Assistant Postmaster-General that the Department would not be warranted in burdening the people with such a great expense when it can more properly, adequately, and economically meet the requirements of postal extension by widening its scope along reasonable and conservative lines, and by establishing additional post-offices wherever the communities are justified in asking for them.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. What report is that?

Mr. NORRIS. This is a report of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads made——

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I simply wanted to know under what Postmaster-General it was.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, this was under a Democratic Administration.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Was it Wilson?

Mr. NORRIS. No; Wilson followed. This was under Bissell's administration.

Mr. MURDOCK. What is the document?

Mr. NORRIS. The document I have read from is a portion of the report of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, made to this House at a time when this House and the committee also were controlled by the Democratic party. It will be observed also, we might note in passing, that the committee in making this report, and also the Post-Office Department in giving their reasons for neglecting and refusing to establish this free delivery, say that it will require an appropriation of $20,000,000 to inaugurate this system of rural free delivery. There is no reason on earth why the Post-Office Department and this committee should make any such reference, especially the Post-Office Department, for the reason that the law at that time was, upon its face, experimental. It was not intended by that appropriation to cover the entire United States; hence the excuse, if excuse it may be called, has no reason upon which it can possibly be based.

But the next year we find this same Democratic Administration opposing the installation of rural free delivery and still refusing to obey the law and use the appropriation, which had in the meantime been increased to $20,000, for the establishment of experimental rural free delivery. The First Assistant Postmaster-General, in his report transmitted to Congress in December, 1894, in defending himself for neglecting his duty, practically defies the law and refuses to obey its mandates.

It will be noted now that this is the second report from the same Assistant Postmaster-General. The first time he gave "pressure of more important questions" as the principal reason for delay. After another year of waiting he now throws off this mask of deception and simply refuses to obey the law because he is opposed to rural free delivery. He says:

> To make such tests would require a much larger appropriation than even that provided by Congress for the current year, namely, $20,000, and in the judgment of this office to expend this amount would be inadvisable. The proposed establishment of rural free delivery would result in an additional cost to the people of about $20,000,000 for the first year; and whatever may be the future of the postal system of this country, I do not believe that the people are yet ready or willing to involve themselves in such a large expenditure for this purpose.

Now, the Postmaster-General himself, submitting his report to Congress at the same time, used language that is almost identical with the language of the Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. MURDOCK. Give us the date of that.

Mr. NORRIS. This was transmitted to Congress in December, 1894. The Postmaster-General himself says:

> The proposed plan of rural free delivery, if adopted, would result in an additional cost to the people of about $20,000,000 for the first year; and whatever may be the future of the postal system of this country, I do not believe the people are ready or yet willing to involve themselves in such a large expenditure for this purpose.

After another year of waiting, after another year of neglect, after another year of defiance to the demands of the farmers of this country the Democratic Administration does not even have the courage to cry, "pressure of more important questions."

But let us pass on still another year and give the Democratic party additional opportunity and more time to get right on this great question and to heed the voice of an outraged people. We find, however, the Democracy still defiant, still refusing to obey the law. The First Assistant Postmaster-General says in his report transmitted to Congress in December, 1895:

> The amount appropriated by Congress, $20,000, to test the feasibility of establishing rural free delivery in rural districts was not expended, and therefore there are no results to report. The amount was deemed entirely inadequate to meet the requirements of a satisfactory test. Rural free delivery may be useful after a while in the more densely populated States, but even then the benefits derived under the most favorable conditions would not be proportionate to the immense amount of money required to maintain the service. I know of no reason to change my views on this subject expressed in my reports of 1893 and 1894.

Now, the Postmaster-General, in his report transmitted at the same time, used language as follows—it was transmitted to Congress in December, 1895, and was written perhaps during the month of November. He says:

> But the difficulties in the way of such experiments and the reasons for viewing the whole plan as impracticable are fully set forth in the report of the House committee on the post-office appropriation bill, second session Fifty-third Congress.

After practically three years of idleness, three years of disobedience of the plain mandate of the law, three years of defiance, the great Democratic party says: "The whole plan is impracticable." Democracy regarded the free rural delivery as a dream, a delusion, and a snare. During most of the following year the Democratic officials refused to do anything for rural free delivery, although the Congress had made another appropriation for this purpose, making $40,000 in all.

But in the fall of 1896, when scent of impending Democratic disaster was in the air, when the cry of an indignant people was demanding the overthrow of a defiant Democracy, the recreant officials made a feint at compliance with their duty, and in October, 1896, after waiting over three years, put a few routes into operation, and when Congress convened in December, 1896, the Department was not ready to make a report on the results. On the 1st day of November of that year the First Assistant Postmaster-General, in his official report, said: "The experiment is now being conducted at half a dozen points." None of these, as I have shown, was put in before October of that year.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, right there, what Postmaster-General was that?

Mr. NORRIS. Postmaster-General Wilson.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. If the gentleman from Nebraska will allow me, doesn't the gentleman know that during the fiscal year of 1896–97, and isn't it an incontrovertible fact, that Postmaster-General Wilson put in operation eighty-four rural free-delivery routes?

Mr. NORRIS. I am about to say what he did. He put in operation some routes in furtherance of this experiment, and if the gentleman will permit me to go on——

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. But I want the gentleman to answer my question, if it is not a fact that Postmaster-General Wilson did put in operation during that fiscal year eighty-four routes?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not think he did, as many as that. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I will come to that further on.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. But here is a letter from your Republican Postmaster-General, Payne, in which he states that during the fiscal year of 1896–97 eighty-four rural free-delivery routes were put in operation by Postmaster-General Wilson.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but the gentleman must understand that during that fiscal year part of it was under the Republican Administration that had come into office on the 4th of March, 1897, and they installed a part of those rural free-delivery routes. I do not intend to be unfair, if the gentleman from North Carolina pleases.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I do not think the gentleman does.

Mr. NORRIS. I am stating the number upon which they made these experiments. I have it in the report, but it is not under my eye at this time. I am confident, however, that it is not as many as the gentleman states.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Every single one of those eighty-four routes was inaugurated by Postmaster-General Wilson, whether they all went into operation before the 4th of March or a part of them after McKinley came in. They were inaugurated on Wilson's order, and here is a letter from the Republican Postmaster-General which says so.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the gentleman is mistaken. Postmaster-General Wilson might have made an order before he went out of office; I do not know as to that, but it is immaterial anyway.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman from Nebraska allow me an interruption?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. At an earlier stage of the gentleman's remarks there was some question about when rural free-delivery service was first recommended, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] a few weeks ago delivered a speech in the House in which he quoted from the report of Postmaster-General Wanamaker in 1892, and said in that connection that he had given the matter careful investigation and that that was the first allusion to a free rural-delivery service, and in the interest of history I will ask the gentleman if he will permit me to read that part of the report. I assume that all parties are in favor of this splendid public service.

Mr. NORRIS. They are at the present time, as far as I know.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow me to read this report?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Postmaster-General Wanamaker, in his report of December, 1892, said:

> My ideal for the American postal service is a system modeled upon a district plan, with fewer offices, and those grouped around central offices and under thorough supervision. By this means at least 20,000 offices could be abandoned that produce no revenue to the Department. In the place of every abolished nonmoney-order and nonregistry office might be put an automatic stamp-selling machine and a letter box to receive mail. With the money saved should be instituted a system of collection and delivery by mounted carriers, bicycles, and star-route and messenger contractors, and the free delivery gradually spread all over the country.

I think that is the first mention, reference, or recommendation of a rural free delivery.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the gentleman from Indiana for reading that extract. I think it explains a controversy that took place some time ago, and is another Republican testimonial in favor of rural free delivery.

Now, let me refer, Mr. Chairman, to the point I had reached in the course of my remarks. I was speaking, I believe, of the waiting of the Democratic officials—the waiting operation that had been taking place for three years or more; in fact, nearly four years. I believe I stated that after waiting for that time they put a few routes in operation, and when Congress convened in December, 1896, the Department was not yet ready to make a report on the result. On the 1st day of November in that year the Assistant Postmaster-General in his official report said—and I quote his exact language:

> The experiment is now being conducted at a half dozen different points.

None of these, as I have shown, were put in before October.

Mr. FLOOD. What is the date of that report?

Mr. NORRIS. The date of that report is the 1st day of November, 1896.

Mr. FLOOD. You mean to contend that Postmaster-General Wilson only put these routes in operation in half a dozen places?

Mr. NORRIS. No. I am not through. I mean to say the Assistant Postmaster-General said he was experimenting at that time at a half a dozen places. That is what he said; and I do not know any other proper course than to take him at his word.

I do concede that before the tests were finished there were more routes put in operation. They kept putting these experimental routes in operation until they went out of office—commencing in October.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. After those few routes that you mention were put in operation, Postmaster-General Wilson, the Democratic Postmaster-General, put in operation eighty-four routes, for your Republican Postmaster-General says so. I have already quoted his letter.

Mr. NORRIS. All right. I do say that according to their own reports he did not put in that many.

Now, I will say to the gentleman it may be possible that prior to going out of office he may have made some kind of an order that brought about the establishment of more routes; but they were not put in—as I think I shall be able to show before I get through—until after the election of 1896. And, after all, it is quite unimportant just how many routes were actually put in by Democratic officials. The fact remains that it had been their duty for four years to put them in and they did nothing until just before going out of office, and in no report do they ever say a word in favor of rural free delivery or recommend its adoption.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. He did make an order; and under that order for the fiscal year 1896–97 eighty-four routes were established.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not denying that eighty-four were established; but the gentleman must permit this distinction to be drawn, that on the 4th day of March, 1897, the Democrats went out of office and the Republicans came in, and the fiscal year did not expire until June 30, 1897, so that those routes were actually put in operation by Republican officials.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. And those eighty-four routes were within the fiscal year.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir.

On November 20, 1896, the Postmaster-General in his report said he would later report for the information of Congress the result of experiments then in operation, and on March 1, 1897, after the Republican victory of November, 1896, and just before the inauguration of William McKinley as President of the United States, the Democratic Postmaster-General, as one of his last official acts, made the promised report. It should be observed that during practically all of the four years of Democratic Administration the duty had devolved upon the Democratic officials to make this test.

Congress had every year made an appropriation for this purpose. They had delayed and procrastinated; they had disregarded their duty and defied the law; they had been false to their trust and had neglected the interests, the comfort, and the happiness of the millions of our rural population until by the righteous verdict of the American people the Democratic party was practically swept from off the earth. One of the peculiar features of this report was that on its face it showed that the Democratic claim that the amount appropriated was insufficient to make the test was absolutely untrue. The amount used in making the test for the time reported was $3,427.23.

Taking it for granted that money was expended for the service for a time not included in the test, and counting the cost of such excess of time at the same proportion and at the same rate as that included in the test, the amount would still be far below the original appropriation of $10,000 made four years before, and as a matter of fact the Department had at the time at its disposal the subsequent appropriations, amounting in the aggregate to $40,000.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not want to do any injustice, and therefore I want to ascertain how many routes the gentleman concedes were established and in actual operation prior to March 4, 1897.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, I will say to the gentleman that when we started I thought I had that report here, but I see I do not have it. I will say, however, that there were forty-two routes in operation at the time the test was made. He made this test for two months, although, as a matter of fact, some routes had been in operation for a couple of months prior to that time. In fact, during the two months preceding he had been occasionally putting in additional routes.

Mr. FLOOD. And you think those forty-two routes could be put in with an expenditure of $3,000?

Mr. NORRIS. Not for an indefinite length of time; but I mean to say that I have made a computation from this Democratic report and allowed the same expense for the length of time that they were actually in. I have made the computation, and the entire amount would be less than $10,000. As a matter of fact, there was the sum of $40,000 at their disposal at the time they made the test.

Mr. FLOOD. How long do you think it would take to make a fair test of these routes?

Mr. NORRIS. I suppose that might depend upon circumstances. I should think, however, that if a Department of our Government had been instructed to make a test, and had had four years in which to make it, they would not have waited until about three months before they went out of office in order to make it if they wanted to make a fair test.

Mr. MURDOCK. How much did that Democratic Administration pay to rural carriers?

Mr. NORRIS. At the rate of $300 per year, I believe.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, I yield.

Mr. THAYER. I understood you, after reciting the dilatory action of the Democratic party from 1894 to 1896, to say that they were swept out of power. Do you think it made one scintilla of difference in the vote of 1896 whether they established these routes generously or niggardly?

Mr. NORRIS. If the gentleman will remember what I said, or will think it over in his sober moments [laughter], he will find that I did not say that it was on account of this identical one thing alone that the Democratic party was swept out of power but I say, and I think it true, that this was one of the great many reasons why the Democratic party was swept, as I say, off the face of the earth at that time. The Democratic party had other sins, other shortcomings; but I am only discussing this one at this time.

Mr. THAYER. I think it had no more to do with it than the change in the moon.

Mr. NORRIS. That may be. The gentleman has a right to his opinion.

Mr. THAYER. Is it not a fact also that Mr. Loud, chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads here for the last eight or ten years, has always been opposed not only to increasing the appropriation, but to maintaining the amount of a former year? And is it not also true that the Democratic party, almost to a man, for the last six years at least, has voted for these appropriations as willingly and more so than those upon the Republican side of the House?

Mr. NORRIS. In answer to the gentleman, I will say, I have no doubt that the Democratic party for some time has been in favor of these appropriations. I have no doubt that the Democratic party, at least as far as this House is concerned at the present time, is in favor of rural free delivery; but the trouble is there was a time when rural free delivery was in its infancy, and then was the time when the Democratic officials in the different departments of the Government were against it and tried to starve the life out of it. The trouble with the Democratic party is that it can not see anything until it is too late. [Laughter.]

Mr. THAYER. And the trouble about you is that you can not see anything this side of 1896.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to say to the gentleman that the Democratic party, upon this proposition, as upon nearly every other, has not been able to see the light until the train has passed.

Mr. THAYER. The Democratic party instituted the scheme originally, did they not?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I will not say that they did.

Mr. THAYER. Will you say that they did not?

Mr. NORRIS. Democratic officials tried in every way they could to kill it while it was yet young, and before it had, figuratively speaking, strength enough to stand alone. In this great train of progress that is speeding along, I want to say to the gentleman, and this illustrates it, the Democratic party is in the last car; you are not only in the last car, but you are sitting on the rear seat and looking out of the back door. [Laughter.] After the train has gone by you are able to recognize a good thing. After the Republican party has inaugurated it, nourished it, and made something out of it, you then try to scrape up some relationship. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. THAYER. Let me say to the gentleman that it seems to be impossible for him to get this side of 1896, as it is for anyone on the Republican side of the House.

Mr. NORRIS. I am willing to have the gentleman ask me a question; but I am not willing to yield for a Democratic speech, because I have some consideration for the gentlemen who are listening to me. [Laughter.]

Mr. FLOOD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman says the Democratic party deserted this proposition in its infancy. I want to ask him if it is not a fact that in the Fifty-fourth Congress the House was Republican and the Senate was Democratic, and if the Republican Post-Office Committee of the House and the Republican House did not refuse to make this appropriation for rural free delivery, and if it is not true that it was only gotten through the Democratic Senate and the conference committee?

Mr. NORRIS. I will come to that subject in my remarks, and I will say that in the Republican Fifty-fourth House a Republican Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads reported in favor of rural free delivery and spoke favorably of it, and when I get a little further along, at the right place, I will go into that fully.

Mr. CANDLER. But the Republican House declined to make the appropriation.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman does not answer my question.

Mr. NORRIS. I will come to that. Now, in this report, made by the Postmaster-General, wherein he gives the account of these tests, as well as in all other reports made by Democratic officials, there is not one sentence and not one word in favor of rural free delivery, no word for its encouragement, no hope for its life. From Democratic officials there never has been a recommendation in its favor, but, on the other hand, every recommendation has been against it, every effort was to discourage it, every move was to delay it, and every attempt was to kill it.

But now, Mr. Chairman, we come to a time when the Democratic party, as far as rural free delivery is concerned, passes into a state of "innocuous desuetude."

On the 4th of March, 1897, the Republican party took charge of the national branches of our Government, and rural free delivery was given a new lease of life. It had passed through the Democratic purgatory of neglect and abuse, and in a weak, struggling condition it became the ward of the McKinley Administration. It was now about to be touched with the magic wand of Republican encouragement and enthusiasm, and to become a bright and a living reality at the fireside of a million humble homes. From that time on rural free delivery has been given encouragement by every official connected with it in any way.

It has been given respectful consideration, friendly encouragement, and favorable recommendation in every annual report of the Post-Office Department since the Republican party took charge in 1897. Nowhere in any report of any Republican official is there any word of condemnation or discouragement. The officials devoted themselves to the expansion and the upbuilding of the service, and at no time did they neglect it or refuse to perform their duty by reason of "the pressure of more important questions," as their Democratic predecessors admittedly did.

I should like to read at length from some of the reports of the Republican officials, showing the favorable consideration given to rural free delivery since the beginning of the McKinley Administration, but as my time is limited I shall read only a few extracts. First, I desire to call attention to a report from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, made to this House in the Fifty-fourth Congress. It must be remembered that at that time the House of Representatives was Republican, and this committee necessarily Republican. This committee, in speaking of rural free delivery, said:

> While the demand for rural free delivery comes from the people in the main, it has been made the subject-matter of discussion by the Post-Office Department from time to time, and it is agreed by those who have investigated the subject that there is no good reason why such accommodations should be withheld.

The first Postmaster-General under the McKinley Administration in his first annual report, in speaking of rural free delivery, used the following language:

> It would be difficult to point to any like expenditure of public money which has been more generously appreciated by the people, or which has conferred greater benefits in proportion to the amount expended. In every instance the introduction of the service has resulted in an increase of the amount of mail matter handled. There is no doubt of the desire wherever the system has been tried that it should be made permanent. There is equally no doubt in my mind that, as stated in the report of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to the Fifty-fourth Congress, the continuance of the rural free delivery will "elevate the standard of intelligence and promote the welfare of the people."

This Congress that he refers to is the Fifty-fourth Congress, a Republican Congress, from the report of whose Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads the Postmaster-General makes that quotation. He says further:

> It has unquestionably proved itself a potent factor in the attainment of what should be one of the chief aims of our Government, the granting of the best possible postal facilities to the farmer and his family.

In 1899 the Postmaster-General under the McKinley Administration spoke in the highest terms of the service, and expressed the opinion that its general adoption would be desirable.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to proceed for ten minutes.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that ought to come out of the time of this side of the House. Gentlemen over there have plenty of time to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Missouri that there has been no limitation whatever of time, and it was expressly understood by the Committee of the Whole that for the present at least there should be no limitation.

Mr. COWHERD. There was also an agreement that the time be equally divided. I have no objection to the time of the gentleman being extended if it is charged to that side.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Missouri to object to the request for unanimous consent?

Mr. COWHERD. I have no objection whatever if the extension is charged to that side of the House.

Mr. CANDLER. I hope there will be no objection, as the gentleman has been very kind in yielding to interruptions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Nebraska may proceed for ten minutes, the time to be charged to the majority. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NORRIS. This Postmaster-General, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, used the following language, and it is Postmaster-General Smith, of the McKinley Administration:

The benefits accruing from the extension of postal facilities to the rural communities may be summarized as follows:

Increased postal receipts, making many of the new deliveries almost immediately self-supporting. In Great Britain, where an extension of rural free delivery on a broader scale has been in progress since 1897, the number of additional letters mailed because of additional facilities afforded is estimated at 50,000,000 for the present year.

Enhancement of the value of farm lands reached by this service and better prices obtained for farm products through more direct communication with the markets and prompter information of their state.

Improved means of travel, some hundreds of miles of country roads, especially in the Western States, having been graded specifically in order to obtain rural free delivery.

Higher educational influences, broader circulation of the means of public intelligence, and closer daily contact with the great world of activity extended to the homes of heretofore isolated rural communities.

In 1900 the Postmaster-General under this same Administration spoke of rural free delivery as follows:

The extraordinary extension of rural free delivery during the past two years has proved to be the most salient, significant, and far-reaching feature of postal development in recent times.

* * * * * * * *

Free delivery in rural communities has been regarded as too costly and burdensome to be admissible. On these grounds the movement encountered great opposition when first proposed, and even when Congress authorized the experiment there was reluctance in trying it. It took time and experience to develop and enforce the more just view, first, that the great body of people who live outside cities and towns are entitled to share in advanced mail facilities even if the cost exceeds the returns; and second, that the barrier of unbalanced expense is not as formidable as was apprehended.

* * * * * * * *

With all these results clearly indicated by the experiment as thus far tried, rural free delivery is plainly here to stay.

In 1901 the Postmaster-General estimated that in four years the service would be extended to the entire country and recommended such extension.

In speaking of the service he said:

The policy of rural free delivery is no longer a subject of serious dispute. It has unmistakably vindicated itself by its fruits.

In 1902 the Postmaster-General spoke of rural free delivery as follows:

Rural-delivery service has become an established fact. It is no longer in the experimental stage, and undoubtedly Congress will continue to increase the appropriation for this service until all the people of the country are reached where it is thickly enough settled to warrant it.

* * * * * * * *

Five years of experiment in this service, added to several months' experience under permanent organization controlled by the civil-service regulations governing other branches of the postal service, have demonstrated that all the claims heretofore advanced in advocacy of the extension of rural free delivery and its adoption as a permanent feature of postal administration have been sustained.

In 1900 rural free delivery received the sanction and approval of President McKinley. In December of that year, in his message to Congress, in speaking of the postal service, he used language as follows:

Its most striking new development is the extension of rural free delivery. * * * This service ameliorates the isolation of farm life, conduces to good roads, and quickens and extends the dissemination of general information.

Experience thus far has tended to allay the apprehension that it would be so expensive as to forbid its general adoption or make it a serious burden. Its actual application has shown that it increases postal receipts and can be accompanied by reduction in other branches of the service, so that the augmented revenues and accomplished savings together materially reduce the net cost.

In his first message to Congress President Roosevelt said:

Among recent postal advances the success of rural free delivery wherever established has been so marked and actual experience has made its benefits so plain that the demand for its extension is general and urgent. It is just that the great agricultural population should share in the improvement of this service.

Again, in his last annual message, the President says:

The rural free-delivery service has been steadily extended. The attention of the Congress is asked to the question of the compensation of the letter carriers and clerks engaged in the postal service, especially on the new rural free-delivery routes. More routes have been installed since the 1st of July last than in any like period in the Department's history. While a due regard to economy must be kept in mind in the establishment of new routes, yet the extension of the rural free-delivery system must be continued, for reasons of sound public policy. No governmental movement of recent years has resulted in greater immediate benefit to the people of the country districts.

Rural free delivery, taken in connection with the telephone, the bicycle, and the trolley, accomplishes much toward lessening the isolation of farm life and making it brighter and more attractive. In the immediate past the lack of just such facilities as these has driven many of the more active and restless young men and women from the farms to the cities, for they rebelled at loneliness and lack of mental companionship. It is unhealthy and undesirable for the cities to grow at the expense of the country; and rural free delivery is not only a good thing in itself, but is good because it is one of the causes which check this unwholesome tendency toward the urban concentration of our population at the expense of the country districts.

It will thus be seen that the rural free-delivery service owes its existence, its advancement, and its present high state of efficiency to the Republican party, and that the comfort and happiness which it carries to the homes of millions of our people is due to the watchful care of the Republican party and in spite of the fact that the Democratic party tried to throttle it and crush the life out of it in its infancy.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the gentleman in his attempt to get on behalf of the Republican party all the credit of this rural free delivery. I want to ask him if he is in favor of this provision in the present bill, which reads as follows——

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I will say to the gentleman, I will not be taken from the course of my remarks by any sort of interruption like that.

Mr. THAYER. I ask if you are willing to answer this question?

Mr. NORRIS. No, sir; I am not going to say whether I am in favor of anything or against anything so far as the bill under consideration is concerned until we get to it. I presume there will be a time coming when that provision will be up before the House, and when that time comes I am ready to go on record, but what the gentleman refers to now I do not know.

The rural free-delivery service in this country has grown to mammoth proportions. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, 8,339 routes were inspected, of which number 1,714 were rejected and 6,653 established. This made a total number of routes in operation on June 30, 1903, of 15,119. On that date there were 11,700 petitions for routes awaiting inspection. Since that time the work of inspection has been rapidly going on, and on March 1, 1904, over 22,000 routes were in actual operation. During the last fiscal year this department has delivered 309,428,128 pieces of mail and collected 48,954,390 pieces. Stamps have been canceled amounting in value to nearly a million dollars, while the beneficial results accomplished have exceeded the most sanguine expectations; yet the highest point of the usefulness of the service has not been reached.

It will be extended until every country home in all reasonably well settled communities is supplied with daily mail. It will be continually improved. New ideas, making more efficient and economical service, will be adopted as experience shall develop them. In addition to all this, the service will become self-sustaining. Experience has already shown that there is constant improvement in this respect, and in some localities where the service is the most perfect many routes are now bringing in more revenue than they cost, when the saving from the discontinuance of small post-offices and star routes is taken into consideration.

The farmers of our country are entitled to this service, not as a charity, not as a favor, but as a matter of justice and of right. The farm families of the United States represent 50,000,000 of our people, occupying more than 6,000,000 homes, and representing more in value than the combined wealth of all other industries.

It is at the rural fireside that virtue, morality, and patriotism have reached their highest state.

From the farm the criminal class gets but very few of its recruits, and in the country home disloyalty and anarchy have found no abiding place. It has been the patriotism of the rural population that has given us stability in times of peace, and it has been the arm, strengthened and steadied by country life, that has given us courage in days of trouble and brought victory to our flag in times of war.

The trials, hardships, vicissitudes, and inconveniences of farm life, in the light of present advancement, are fast fading away. Already the world is beginning to see that the highest and truest type of contentment and human happiness can be found in the country home. The educational advantages of rural free delivery, together with the other inventions of our enlightened age, will carry into every such home all the comforts of our day, all the blessings of peace, and at that fireside and around that hearthstone will be taught the lessons of love and virtue, of patriotism and loyalty. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, both political parties are now in favor of rural free delivery. There is no difference of opinion upon that question. The question, however, which we are endeavoring to decide on both sides of the House is which party is entitled to credit for the origin of the service. I propose, later on in my remarks, to discuss this question in reply to the speech of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who has just preceded me and spoken upon the same subject. Before doing so, however, I will address myself to some of the general provisions of the bill, especially that part of the bill relating to the rural free delivery of mail. This bill, Mr. Chairman, reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, recommends appropriations which aggregate, in round numbers, $170,000,000, which is about $2,000,000 more than the estimates. The sum recommended by the committee is, in round figures, $17,000,000 more than the appropriation for the current year, which amounted to about $153,000,000, an increase of about 10 per cent.

The regular estimates of the Department did not include complete estimates for the rural service, but stated that in the event of increase of salary of rural carriers and provision for greater extension of the service, then the estimates should be increased in accordance with such provisions.

The committee effected a reduction—

Says the report—

below the estimates of the Department of $3,200,000 (in round numbers) on items outside of the rural free-delivery service. The increase of salaries of rural carriers and additional appropriations for the extension of the rural service necessitated an increase of $5,200,000 above the estimates for that service.

The committee says further:

Your committee recommends an appropriation of $20,180,000 for this service, being an increase of $5,180,000, or 34.6 per cent. The total sum recommended for the support of the rural free-delivery service is $20,773,700, an increase of 64.6 per cent above the appropriation for the current year, which amounted to $12,621,700.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is apparently a large increase, but it is justified by the value of this service to the people. I am opposed to a large standing army. The Democratic party is opposed to a large standing army. We rely for the protection of the Government upon the citizen soldiery, who upon the call of the Executive are ever ready to respond to the call to arms, when the tocsin of war sounds, in defense of the flag and our national honor. There is some difference of opinion with reference to a great navy. We need a navy large enough to maintain unimpaired the Monroe doctrine and protect our coasts, but the greatest good to the greatest number is involved in liberal appropriations for the postal service, as suggested a few days ago in the eloquent speech of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD]. The Constitution enumerates many powers vested in Congress, but the power to regulate post-offices and post-roads is as important to all the people as any enumerated in that instrument.

As for myself, I stand ready to vote liberal appropriations for this purpose. We may economize on our naval equipment. We should decrease expenditures for an army, maintained and necessary only to carry out a policy of imperialism in acquiring and holding foreign territory, to be governed as colonies contrary to the Constitution and the past theory and practice of the Republic and teachings of the founders of the Government. But the postal service is one agency of the Government which should not be curtailed, even if it does not pay its way. Let us have economy in other directions; let us investigate and stop the frauds and corruption; but let us not economize in the Post-Office Department, in this great branch of the Government service. It is my purpose to-day to address myself particularly to that branch of the postal service known as the rural free delivery of mail. The extraordinary extension of rural free delivery in the past decade has proven the most gratifying feature of our postal development. This is the age of quick and far-reaching communication. We know to-day the events of yesterday in all parts of the world. The telegraph and telephone have annihilated space and time and linked together every nation and all parts of the habitable globe.

We have developed to the highest point the quick dispatch of intelligence by means of the electric wire and telephone and the railway mail service, and these agencies we are now supplementing by rural free delivery, giving the rural home as well as the city home quick and full communication with all parts of the world. At first experimental, the service is now firmly established, and no backward step is possible.

The salaries of the carriers should be increased as recommended by the committee, and the Department should eventually, by means of loop routes, extend the system.

ADVANTAGES OF RURAL FREE DELIVERY.

It is generally conceded—

Said First Assistant Postmaster-General Johnson, in his report, November 16, 1901—that no other branch of our great postal system is as popular as the rural free-delivery service. This, I think, is due largely to the fact that it carries with it the facilities of all other branches. It is, in short, the extension of the post-office into the homes of the people. The carrier performs all the functions of a postmaster. He not only delivers and collects ordinary mail, but carries a supply of stamps for the accommodation of rural patrons, is prepared to register letters at the roadside, or to accept money for the purchase of money orders. It is evident that the more easily and conveniently the carrier performs these functions the more satisfactory and popular the service becomes.

The services rendered, furthermore, are of the greatest benefit to the people by reason of the fact that recently steps have been taken to provide for the delivery of weather forecasts wherever the information can reach the post-office in time for proper preparation before the carriers leave on their routes, and it is suggested in the annual report of the Postmaster-General for the year ending June 30, 1903, that, in connection with the extension of the rural free-delivery service, there be given a telephone service into the farming districts of the country for the purpose of transmitting the contents of letters to the persons to whom the same are addressed, thus saving much time in the transmission of important messages to the people residing along the lines of the rural free-delivery routes. So that it can be seen at a glance that with the continued improvement and extension of this service the isolation of farm life will be ameliorated and the rural districts of the country brought in closer and quicker communication constantly with the cities and towns of the country.

Experience thus far has tended to allay the apprehension that it would be so expensive as to forbid its general adoption, making it a serious burden. Its actual application has shown that it increases postal receipts and can be accompanied by reductions in other branches of the postal service, so that the increased revenues and savings together materially reduce the net cost.

FIRST EXPERIMENTS AND APPROPRIATIONS.

The first experiments in this service were under Postmaster-General Wilson during Cleveland's Administration, and since that time there has been no backward movement in rural free delivery. Its extension has kept pace with the appropriations made by Congress for its introduction and maintenance. Prior to 1897 and during the second Cleveland Administration the appropriations aggregated $40,000 for experimental service, and with this appropriation a limited number of routes were established by Postmaster-General Wilson. I find from the committee report before me that the appropriations and expenditures for the entire rural free-delivery service since its inauguration experimentally have been, including deficiencies:

Year.	Appropriations, including deficiencies.	Expenditures.
1893	10,000.00
1894	10,000.00
1895	20,000.00
1896	Indefinite.
1897	10,000.00
1898	50,250.35	$50,250.06
1899	150,098.98	150,078.60
1900	450,000.00	448,480.14
1901	1,753,840.33	1,753,757.36
1902	4,083,922.91	4,083,889.42
1903	8,054,400.00	8,013,046.50
1904	12,950,957.65

Estimated for 1905, $15,785,400.

Total amount recommended by the committee for the support of the rural free-delivery service for the fiscal year 1905, $20,773,700.

According to the report of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, November 28, 1903, the routes now in operation are 19,398; estimated number March 1, 1904, 22,678; estimated, June 30, 1904, 24,500.

ORIGIN OF THE RURAL FREE-DELIVERY SERVICE.

Many routes established prior to 1897 and prior to the McKinley Administration are set out in page 60 of the annual report of First Assistant Postmaster-General Heath for the year ending June 30, 1898. It will be seen that numerous routes were established in 1896, prior to the Administration of President McKinley and under the second Administration of President Cleveland. Thus it will be seen that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] in his late speech was in error in claiming the entire credit of this service for the Republican party. As has been the custom of gentlemen upon that side of the House for some years past, the gentleman from Kansas is claiming that the Republican party is entitled to the credit for everything that is good in the country. No doubt the Republican party will claim credit now for the advance in the price of cotton, due to short crop and the demands of the mills. But it is certainly clearly established that the Republican party did not originate, although it has helped to extend, in compliance with the demand of the people, the rural free-delivery service.

The origin of that service can unquestionably be traced to Democratic sources. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] stated that Postmaster-General Wanamaker in 1892 strongly indorsed the rural free delivery of mail and urged its extension. He did nothing of the kind. There was no such thing as rural free delivery of mail in his day. What Mr. Wanamaker indorsed and urged was the extension of the letter-carrier system to smaller cities and towns and into the outlying suburbs of the larger cities. It was William L. Wilson, President Cleveland's second Postmaster-General, who, in 1896, began the experiment of rural free delivery of mail, and systematically applied thereto the $40,000 which had accumulated during the Cleveland Administration; appropriations which had been suggested by Democrats, brought in by Democratic committees, and voted by Democratic Houses in 1893, 1894, and 1895, and at the instance of the Senate in 1896, after a Republican House had refused to put the appropriation in the bill. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] a few days ago and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] to-day made the common and venerable mistake about Mr. Wanamaker to which I have alluded. It will be seen by a careful reference to the Wanamaker report that all that Mr. Wanamaker recommended was the extension of the letter-carrier system into the smaller cities and the suburbs of the large cities.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] also charged that President Cleveland and his first Postmaster-General, Mr. Bissell, were opposed to the rural free mail-delivery system. They simply thought at the time—and that is all there is in this charge—that it was too expensive to be warranted.

However, Democratic Congresses throughout the second Cleveland Administration continued to vote from year to year $10,000 as an appropriation for beginning the experiment, and in 1896 the incontrovertible fact remains that William L. Wilson, Democratic Postmaster-General, began the experiment in earnest, systematically applying thereto the appropriations of $40,000 which had accumulated for that purpose.

In the Fifty-second Congress the first bills looking to rural free delivery of mail were introduced, and they were introduced by Democrats, such as Clarke of Alabama and others. The Post-Office Committee was in charge of Democrats in the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses. In the Fifty-second Congress Mr. Henderson, of North Carolina, was the chairman of that committee. This committee prepared and reported to the House a committee bill on the subject of rural free mail delivery in May, 1892. But the time was yet too early, and the bill, it is true, was not passed or pressed for action.

In the short session of the same Congress an item of $10,000 as an experimental appropriation for rural free mail delivery was added to the post-office appropriation bill, and by consent of the committee, of the House, of the Senate, and of the President—all Democrats—that bill became a law.

The same thing happened in both sessions of the Fifty-third Congress—a Democratic Congress. In both of those Democratic Congresses almost all those who took sides in any way for rural free mail delivery were Democrats, and most of those who took the other side were Republicans. Among the Democrats who favored rural free delivery were Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, LIVINGSTON of Georgia, and many others.

Mr. NORRIS. When the gentleman says that this item was favored by "a Democratic President," I should like to ask him whether the "Democratic President" did anything more than sign the general appropriation bill in which this item was contained along with many others?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Of course not; but it was a Democratic committee that reported the bill and it was a Democratic House and a Democratic Senate that passed the bill. The President, it is true, simply performed the function of the Executive, as all Presidents do, in signing bills.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the gentleman whether that same Democratic President, or his Postmaster-General, or his Assistant Postmaster-General, during those three or four years, ever said anything in any of their reports in favor of rural free delivery?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Certainly; William L. Wilson did.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to have the gentleman quote it. I confess I could not find any such thing.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Actions speak louder than words. It was William L. Wilson, the Democratic Postmaster-General, who put the first rural free-delivery routes in operation.

Mr. NORRIS. In his reports, however, he has no word of commendation of this system—not one—that I have been able to find. And did he not wait nearly four years before he put any such route in operation?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I will give the gentleman in a few moments the authority of no less a prominent Republican than Perry S. Heath to the effect that Postmaster-General Wilson is entitled to credit for the inauguration of this service.

Mr. MADDOX. Remember that Postmaster-General Wilson was only in office two years.

Mr. NORRIS. But Postmaster-General Bissell was in office before him.

Mr. MADDOX. That has nothing to do with the case.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Certainly not.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as is usual in such cases, more was said about this matter, and more opposition was manifested to the rural free-delivery service during the first year or two of its incipiency than during all the intervening years since that time. But the opposition soon vanished.

The reason was that "rural free mail delivery" was a success from the start. Now, the Republicans, like my friend from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], are always trying to belittle and misrepresent Postmaster-General Wilson's agency in giving the system a successful start; but the fact remains that he did start the service and that it proved such a success under his management that ever since then it has gone on increasing as a matter of course, without opposition of any value, and almost automatically, as a public necessity of the most pronounced type. It was Postmaster-General Wilson, a Democrat, who laid the foundation and inaugurated this great system, and all the public documents, reports of committees, and records of Congress bear out this statement.

The Republicans, like my friend from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], have constantly represented that Mr. Wilson undertook the matter unwillingly and half-heartedly, even going so far as to hint that he took pains to execute the initial operations in such a way as to create a bad effect and make the system unsuccessful. This is the tone in which the subject is detailed in the report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, Perry Heath, in 1899. That official then declared that although Mr. Wilson had promised to put the experiment to the test "by the best methods he could devise," he did so "with many misgivings" and where the service was "impossible of execution." Mr. Heath goes on to specify and make the most he can of three unsuccessful routes among those established by Mr. Wilson; but afterwards, I will say to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], he was compelled to admit and he did admit, in a later report, that these original routes were—so well placed and gave such immediate satisfaction to the people—that their merits could not be obscured.

I quote his words—

And these routes—

Says Mr. Heath—

demonstrated clearly that rural free delivery, judiciously inaugurated, could be made less expensive and more nearly self-sustaining than the urban free-delivery service established in many of the smaller cities under the authority of Congress.

And—

it was thus made evident that the expansion of rural free delivery would be only a question of time.

See pages 75 and 77 of the report.

This is a great admission on the part of one of the most distinguished Republican partisans who has ever held office in this country, former secretary of the Republican national executive committee. It admits, and very unwillingly admits, that Mr. Wilson's intelligent and faithful experiments were a brilliant success, so much so that they rendered the expansion of rural free mail delivery a certainty.

Now, on page 78 of the same report Mr. Heath goes on to say that no sooner had he got well settled in his office in March, 1897, which was after the inauguration of President McKinley, than—

Petitions from every section of the country where the service had been given a fair trial began to pour in upon the Department.

Here is another candid admission of the great popularity of the results obtained by the routes established by Mr. Wilson, Democratic Postmaster-General.

Since 1896, the year of Mr. Wilson's activity in the matter, there has been no obstacle in the way of the development of this service. The people have signified that they want the service extended as far as possible and as quickly as possible, and the latest official estimates lead to the expectation that rural free mail delivery will sooner or later be extended all over the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, before I leave the question as to the origin of the service, having given the admission of Mr. Heath that Postmaster-General Wilson's experiments laid the foundation of the service, in reply to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], I wish further to read from a letter addressed to the Hon. L. F. LIVINGSTON, a Member of this House from the State of Georgia, by Hon. Henry C. Payne, the present Republican Postmaster-General. This, Mr. Chairman, is a copy of the letter, and the original is in the possession of Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Payne says:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 25, 1904.

Hon. L. F. LIVINGSTON, House of Representatives.

SIR: Replying to your letter of the 18th instant, making certain inquiries relative to the early history of the rural free-delivery service, I would refer you to the acts making appropriations for the postal service for the fiscal years 1893-94, 1894-95, and 1896-97, from which I quote as follows:

1893-94: "For free-delivery service, including existing experimental free delivery, $11,254,900, of which the sum of $10,000 shall be applied, under the direction of the Postmaster-General, to experimental free delivery in rural communities other than towns and villages."

Postmaster-General Bissell stated in his annual report for this fiscal year that the $10,000 provided for rural delivery was not used. The so-called "experimental delivery," which was established at a limited number of offices under authority of act of October, 1890, and provided a house-to-house delivery of mail in small towns and villages, was continued during this year.

1894-95: "For free delivery, including existing experimental free-delivery offices, $12,327,685.33, of which the sum of $20,000 shall be applied, under the direction of the Postmaster-General, to experimental free delivery in rural communities other than towns and villages, and the Postmaster-General shall be required to report to the next session of Congress such measure as he may deem practical for extending mail service to rural districts and the probable cost of such extension."

In the report of Postmaster-General Wilson, who was appointed in March, 1895, it is stated that the amount appropriated for a test of rural delivery was not expended. The experimental free delivery in towns and villages was continued during the year.

1895-96: "For free-delivery service, including existing experimental free-delivery offices, $12,790,283.64."

No rural routes were established during this year. The experimental free-delivery service in towns and villages was discontinued at the close of this fiscal year, Congress having failed to provide an appropriation for its continuance.

1896-97: "For free-delivery service, * * * in all, $12,818,250, * * * Provided further, That $10,000 of this amount may be used to defray the expense of experiments in rural free delivery, under the direction of the Postmaster-General, and that the amount heretofore appropriated for this purpose and still unexpended be available for said experiment."

During this fiscal year eighty-four rural routes were established on the order of Postmaster-General Wilson.

Very respectfully, H. C. PAYNE, Postmaster-General.

Mr. CANDLER. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. It is a letter of January 25, 1904.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. That fiscal year refers to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, does it not?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. It does, but the language of your Republican Postmaster-General, Mr. Payne——

Mr. NORRIS. I understand.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. One moment. Let me reply to the gentleman. The language of your Republican Postmaster-General Payne is, "that during this fiscal year eighty-four rural routes were established on the order of Postmaster-General Wilson."

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I understand.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. It does not matter whether those routes went into operation before President McKinley was inaugurated on the 4th of March, 1897, or not. It was William L. Wilson, a Democrat, who first established those eighty-four routes, and it was done on his order, and you can not get away from that fact. [Applause.]

Mr. NORRIS. But the letter does not say that they were established by Mr. Wilson.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. It says that "during this fiscal year eighty-four rural routes were established on the order of Postmaster-General Wilson."

Mr. NORRIS. If any of them were put in after the 4th of March, 1897, they were put in operation by Republican officials, were they not?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. This letter does not so state. The gentleman can see the original letter in the possession of Mr. LIVINGSTON.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, I do not deny the letter.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I understand that. The letter says during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, part of which was under a Democratic Administration and a part under the McKinley Administration, there were eighty-four routes established on the order of Postmaster-General Wilson, and he laid the foundation and basis of the whole rural free-delivery service.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I will state to the gentleman from Nebraska that if they were established on the order of Postmaster-General Wilson, then the petitions must have been received prior to that time and the examination made and the order given for their establishment, and they had to be established then unless the succeeding Postmaster-General overruled the order and canceled it.

Mr. GRIFFITH. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest that the first experiment made in rural free delivery was made in Bartholomew County, Ind., in the Fourth Congressional district. This was the first experiment that was made, and that was made in 1896 and under a Democratic Administration; and in 1897, under Mr. McKinley's Administration, this route in Bartholomew County, Ind., the first route ever established in the United States, established by a Democratic Administration, was ordered to be discontinued; but upon my request that order was set aside and the route was reestablished, and it is yet in existence.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. There were a large number of routes in operation in 1896, before McKinley's inauguration.

RURAL FREE DELIVERY BENEFITS THE FARMS.

Whatever may have been the origin of the service, however, Mr. Chairman, the great benefit and benign influence of rural free delivery is being felt throughout the entire country. It is one of the few ways in which the Government has been able to extend help and aid to the farming people, a class of our citizens who have ever received as little benefit from the General Government as any part of our citizenship, and yet at the same time constitute the bone and sinew of the land. With rural free delivery attesting the visible presence and service of the Government, there arises in the mind of the farmer a conviction that he shares with the people of the towns and cities the advantages of the Government. He feels that this helpful agency of his country comes to his door, and the effect is to stir his pride and stimulate his loyalty and patriotism.

The farm is brought into direct daily contact with the currents and movements of the business world. The value of farms, as has been shown in many cases, is enhanced. Good roads become indispensable, and their improvement is an essential condition of the service. It is well known that the tendency of the times has been to overcrowd the great cities and to leave the farms. By rural free delivery this tendency is checked. Rural free delivery brings the farm within the daily range of the activities of the world, and the isolation and monotony which have been the bane of agricultural life are mitigated. It is one of the most effective and powerful agencies in the education of the people. With the closer contact with the world and the distribution of a larger number of newspapers the standard of intelligence is raised and enlightened interest in public affairs is quickened.

RURAL FREE DELIVERY AIDS GOOD ROADS.

Recently there has been inaugurated in Congress a movement for an appropriation by the National Government in aid of good roads. This movement will be of great benefit to the people, and, if carefully safeguarded, I am in favor of such legislation. But with the extension of rural free delivery the movement for good roads is surer of meeting with success, for one of the greatest obstacles encountered in the extension of rural free delivery is the unimproved condition of many of the country roads. But as the rural free-delivery service continues to grow in popularity the people, in order to secure its advantages, will insist upon good roads. With all these advantages of rural free delivery it is plainly here to stay. It can not be abandoned where it has been established, and it can not be maintained without being extended. It is a service in which there can be no backward step. Its extension means also other benefits to the people.

The appropriation recommended for the present fiscal year is no more than is sufficient to meet the growing needs of the service and the demands of the people for this institution. It is estimated that to extend the system throughout the United States would approximate an annual cost of $25,000,000, but it may reasonably be claimed that a general extension of this service would increase the postal revenues from year to year at such a rate that eventually the service will become self-sustaining. This is no more than was claimed by the friends of free city delivery when the introduction of that service into our large cities was opposed by those who saw in it an expenditure which would entail a heavy burden upon the future revenues of the country.

As for myself, Mr. Chairman, representing a great agricultural constituency and their interests, desiring to secure for them the greatest good in every way from the Government under which they live, as well as the best and most improved postal facilities, it is my desire to see the extension of this service in my district and State and throughout the country until it carries its blessings to the door of every farmhouse and every rural community in the land. I regard the appropriations for this service as returning to the agricultural portion of our people no more than is their just due. The extension of this service and the inauguration of a system of good roads will give greater intelligence, greater satisfaction with farm life, thus counteracting the tendency toward overcrowding our great cities.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I am willing to vote all that is necessary not only for the extension of this service, but for its improvement and its betterment in every way that can be devised. I believe that eventually the service will pay its own way, but if it does not do so it is one of the greatest public conveniences and blessings ever instituted, and it should not be allowed to retrograde, and, as I have endeavored to show, the people owe this great convenience and public blessing mainly to the Democratic party. [Applause.]

Whatever may be its origin, let it be nonpartisan, liberal in its administration—not a party machine, but a great agency, patriotically supported by all parties to benefit and enlighten the people and to benefit especially that class of our population who receive so few appropriations and benefits from our Government—the agricultural people and farmers of this great nation. [Loud applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I beg to say at the outset that I am earnestly in favor of a substantial increase in the salary of rural carriers. I believe in the perfection of the rural service in every way possible, so that it will carry all possible advantages and conveniences to the rural population of the country. When the proposition to put rural carriers permanently upon the basis of a salary was before the last Congress for consideration, the Hon. Eugene F. Loud, of California, who was then chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, opposed the policy, and advocated with much ability and earnestness the idea of letting the carrying by public contract. I believed he was wrong then and I am satisfied now that he was wrong, but in the course of his remarks he took occasion to say that the rural carriers of the country would soon organize into a political body with the view of attempting to influence legislation in securing increased salaries and other favors from Congress.

I have before me, Mr. Chairman, a rather remarkable letter vindicating the prophecy of Mr. Loud. I received through the mails to-day by special delivery, from a carrier in my district, a copy of a letter which he says is being addressed by the president of the National Carriers' Association to every carrier in the United States urging them to send emergency telegrams to their Members of Congress demanding legislation along certain lines. The man who sent me the letter I know personally, and I know him to be thoroughly reliable, and I have no doubt at all that the statement he makes is reliable. His statement is further corroborated by the fact that I received yesterday two telegrams from remote parts of my district, literal copies of the form as set out in the president's circular letter.

I regard this as a most reprehensible proceeding. The country now is criticising the very mild practice, which is the result of a custom as strong as law itself, requiring Members of Congress to make recommendations to the various Departments of the Government on behalf of their constituents, but that is of little consequence in comparison with this insidious attempt to control legislation by political coercion. I am always glad to hear from my constituents respecting their views upon public matters, but I do protest against the organization of public officers for the purpose of bringing pressure to bear upon Congress by methods outlined in the letter which I now send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 7, 1904.

To the rural letter carriers of the United States:

I believe we have got things coming our way and will succeed if you do your part. I understand the situation, and the Department will take no notice of any work you do in regard to pushing our bill.

The general appropriation bill under which our relief will come will be brought before the House for consideration to-day. It will likely be under consideration all this week, and the vote may not be taken before the first of next week, but do not delay your telegrams. Send them as soon as possible after receiving this communication.

The carriers from each county should send a telegram something like the following:

"Hon. ——— ———, M. C., Washington, D. C.:

"Rural carriers of ——— County unanimously favor graded scale; fifteen days' vacation. Let privileges alone; earnestly support amendment.

"Yours, respectfully."

Then let every carrier get at least one influential patron or politician, and, if possible, some one who is personally acquainted with your Member of Congress to sign a telegram something like the following:

"Hon. ——— ———, M. C., Washington, D. C.:

"Rural patrons unanimously favor graded scale, fifteen days' vacation. Let privileges alone; earnestly support amendment. Vitally interested.

"Yours, respectfully."

These telegrams will not cost more than 40 or 50 cents, so as quick as you can get them signed fire them in. There will be thousands of telegrams and it means over $20 a month increase in our salary. So see to it that your link in the chain does not fail, and if any carrier can send three or four of these kind of telegrams it will greatly assist us.

I have now got the assistance of quite a number of prominent men from different parts of the country who have millions behind them. They are interested and are here personally to help with the fight. We are thoroughly organized, and they are bringing powerful influence to bear upon the Members of Congress.

Where you were once in despair you now have hope. We must have these telegrams. Do your duty, and do it quick.

State officers, do not lose one moment in forwarding these communications to your county associates and carriers throughout your State.

County officers, do not lose one moment in getting these instructions to every carrier in your county, and have him do his duty.

Yours, very respectfully,

F. H. CUNNINGHAM,
National President.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman from Indiana where that gentleman lives.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Cunningham?

Mr. MADDOX. The gentleman who worked up this matter.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand he lives at Omaha, Nebr., and he is president of the National Rural Carriers' Association.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. MADDOX. We had better have him down here and indict him right away.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Indiana, as he desires to answer questions.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman if this letter is not in contravention of the order issued by the President in reference to employees of the Government?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I so regard it; and, by the way, I understand Mr. Cunningham is in the city now. I met him personally a week or so ago in the lobby and talked to him about legislation.

Mr. MADDOX. Is he not under civil service? Does not the civil-service law apply to him?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand he is in the classified service, and I presume this is a breach of the service regulations, but the matter has not been brought to the attention of the Administration. It probably will be through the means of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and that is one object I had in putting it in the RECORD.

Mr. LIND. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Certainly.

Mr. LIND. I simply wish to state that I have had four telegrams already of the character indicated in the paper just read. I was called out at midnight last night to receive and read one.

Mr. MADDOX. I have had twelve or fourteen.

Mr. MANN. I hope time enough will be given for the other gentlemen to confess.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time to my colleague.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question before he proceeds: Will it be necessary to have a report from the Post-Office Department embodying these telegrams and the names of the Members who have received them?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think if the gentleman should wish to prepare another speech, and that was the only means of his doing so, we might accommodate him. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DOUGLAS].

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, having taken a very decided, active, and sincere interest in the work of endeavoring to secure for New York City proper postal facilities ever since I have had the honor of being a Member of this House, I deem it, therefore, desirable at this time and during the debate on the post-office and post-roads bill to make a plain statement of the efforts made by myself and others to do justice to our city and outline the position as it exists at the present moment, especially owing to the recent discussion of the matter by the New York City press. The question was taken up by me with the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds [Mr. MERCER] and other gentlemen of that committee early in the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress. New York City had not been considered for nearly twenty-five years, and the postal facilities provided by the old post-office building were such that it was recognized by all that relief was imperative, that we had justifiable ground to ask it, and that the necessities of the position required prompt extra facilities. The entire New York City delegation advocated strongly the direct appropriation of $2,500,000 to $3,000,000 for the purchase of a site and asked for a commission of New York men to be named, of undoubted character, with authority to take immediate action.

The chairman of the committee, however, felt that it was an important subject, that great care should be used, and he decided that he would prefer to create a commission with power to secure a site and to report at the next session of Congress, and in this view his committee concurred. It was further decided by the committee that it would be, in their judgment, best to appoint on the commission men who did not reside in New York City, and while I objected to this, as no outsider can understand the requirements of a city as well as a resident, or will take as much pride in reaching a proper conclusion, yet in view of the fact that the committee could not be brought to see the matter from my standpoint, I reluctantly acquiesced, and finally the clause incorporated in the public buildings and grounds bill of 1902 was as follows:

SEC. 13. That a commission hereby created, consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General of the United States, be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a suitable site in the city of New York, borough of Manhattan, and State of New York, upon which to erect a fireproof building for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office in said city: Provided, That the site selected shall be bounded on each side by a street. When said Commission has acquired a site in said city, as herein provided, the commission shall make a report to Congress, stating the location, dimensions, and cost of the same, and recommend to Congress the character and size of a building that should be erected upon said site, and state the probable cost of such a building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches.

When this bill was being discussed before the House remarks were made by several New York gentlemen, who objected to the likely delay of a commission, and without reviewing the entire proceedings, which can be found in the RECORD under date of Tuesday, April 29, 1902, I would state that the chairman referred specially to several gentlemen, including myself, as those who gave evidence and information of value to the committee. Mr. Mercer stated that the selection of a site was most important; that the commission would have to carefully consider all plans submitted, and that it would be no simple matter to accomplish the purchase; that the site would be expensive and the location must satisfy certain conditions.

At date named I made some remarks in connection with the subject, and without quoting at length would say that I stated among other things that the creation of this commission would undoubtedly secure for us a splendid site, and we would also beyond question obtain a building commensurate in importance with the city's greatness, for which Congress would certainly grant us a proper appropriation; further, that we hoped to secure a Federal building which would be a gratification to our citizens, those who would visit us from other parts of the country, also our foreign friends. When the committee gave us this commission I do not consider that there was the slightest question in the minds of any of these gentlemen, nor was there any doubt whatever with a man on the New York delegation, that it was intended that New York should be granted prompt postal relief and we had practically secured a building worthy of the status of New York, to be erected in a central location convenient for our business men, and there was no other intention or thought. The committee appointed, the Postmaster-General, the Attorney-General, and the Secretary of the Treasury undoubtedly also held similar ideas and views and at the time strongly so expressed themselves.

When Congress reconvened the following winter we all hoped and expected that a report would be ready, but the commission had not been able to bring the matter to a final conclusion, and time went on. During December, 1902, and the early part of 1903, I frequently spoke to the commission on the subject and found they still had not reached a decision. Thus affairs went along until the end of January, and as late as the 29th of that month the Postmaster-General and the Secretary of the Treasury attended a banquet in New York, given by the West Side Republican Club, invited by myself and others, and proposed to further investigate sites at the time. We all now waited with eager expectancy for the conclusions of the committee, as this was the short session and expired by law on the 4th of March. I would call your attention to the fact that the clause creating a commission did not limit the amount to be paid for a site, and directed its purchase, also required the erection of a fireproof building, and after they had acquired the ground they were to report to Congress, giving the location, dimensions, and cost of the same, and recommend the character and size of a building that should be erected, further stating the probable cost, including fireproof vaults, heating, and ventilating apparatus and approaches.

These gentlemen were all busy men at the head of great Departments, and naturally their attention was largely given up to their regular work, and it was difficult for them to properly look after a special matter of this kind, and while not in any way reflecting upon the commission it proved the greater wisdom of having tried to have named a committee composed of men who would have had more time and who lived on the proposed field of action, as they naturally would also have more interest in the matter. Until early in February there was no hint of any kind that a change of plan from the original instructions, intent, and idea was contemplated. About this time, however, a proposition made by the Pennsylvania Railroad was given consideration. This great corporation was proposing to established a footing within the city of New York by tunneling under the Hudson River, and were buying property between Thirty-first and Thirty-third streets and Seventh and Ninth avenues for the purpose of establishing a great freight and passenger station. They proposed to sell the Government a section of land on Eighth avenue between Thirty-first and Thirty-third streets, but to be held subject to the rights of the Pennsylvania Railroad and the New York and Long Island Railroad for the use of trackage, platforms, etc., 20 feet below the curb line of the street.

The Pennsylvania Railroad had only just perfected their plans. It was very uncertain how long it would take them to build their tunnel and be able to place the ground in condition to be built upon. The time was estimated anywhere from four to five years at the minimum. On hearing of this plan I at once took exception to such a disposition of the subject, claiming the site was not a proper one for a post-office and would lead to the thwarting of the cherished and anticipated hopes of the entire New York delegation and the public of our great city, who expected a building to be erected in the heart of the city. It was an absolute and entire change of front and was generally condemned by our press and the public. It was too late to prevent, however, the report from being made, and finally, on or about the 23d day of February, the commission recommended accordingly, which left but a few days before the adjournment of Congress on the 4th of March, 1903. There were no plans of building, estimates of cost, etc., furnished by the commission in accordance with the original act; and, in fact, the commission had failed to carry out any of its provisions. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds had reported their bill on the 16th of February, 1903, as, naturally, they could not wait for this special report, and the two million asked for was added as an amendment to the sundry civil bill in the Senate.

The conference report on this bill was only presented to the House March 3, 1903, or the day before adjournment. The report was made at such a late date that it was absolutely impossible for any New York Member to take any action or practically do anything whatever in reference to the matter. The position developed at once an opposition on the part of the conferees of the House, and when the matter was discussed the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations at that time [Mr. CANNON] made this statement, having been requested by several New York Members, including myself, to explain why the provision was eliminated from the bill. Mr. CANNON said that the proposed proposition to buy the Pennsylvania site really never reached the House of Representatives; that it only reached the Senate after the bill had been reported to that body with the amendments of the Senate committee, and on the run, as it were, the Senate put the amendment in the bill. He also stated that when they went into conference a gentleman who spoke or professed to speak in the interest of the New York Central Railroad Company informed them that said company also had a site at its terminal that it wanted to dispose of to the Government for a post-office, and application was made to the committee to say whether that matter could not also be treated.

It was found that said proposition was not in conference, and after obtaining all the light possible to secure in the closing hours of the session the conferees on the part of the House found themselves in a fog. They were not sure that it was wise, whether they wished to buy this terminal property, whether it was worth one million or two million dollars, a suggestion being made that they could buy the New York Central terminal site for one million; also the committee had failed to state what kind of a building it was proposed to erect, and other details being wanted they decided that it was not well to have the item go in the bill. He added that the only positive answer they could get to anything was that these terminals would not be completed before Congress came together again. I would remark at this point this was the first that was ever heard of the New York Central site or proposition. I would also call attention to the fact that the chairman states that at that time the New York Central was willing to sell for $1,000,000. In view of these facts no action was taken, and the matter went over until this year, or the first and second sessions of the Fifty-eighth Congress.

It certainly was most unfortunate and greatly to be deplored that the commission did not recommend, as was expected by every one and their original intention, the purchase of a site in the central section of New York, anywhere, say, from Twenty-third street north and on one of the great arteries of New York City or adjacent to it; also over the subway or so situated as to enable easy connection to be made therewith. Those who are conversant with our city are aware that this great piece of engineering work was then under way and is now about completed. It is an underground railroad running from one end to the other of the city, north and south, both on the east and west sides of the city, and connecting with the Grand Central Depot; also having connections with ferries east and west, and ultimately branches will be extended to Brooklyn, Williamsburg, and practically all important points. The idea was that the mails once reaching the central station could be assorted rapidly and then cheaply conveyed through the subway to all portions of the city.

I believe that a great opportunity for the improvement of New York's postal facilities was lost, as well as much valuable time, owing to the change in the plan. Had the commission reported this way and promptly, in time for the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to have provided the funds necessary for the starting of the building, there is no reason why at this date, the contracts having also been promptly let, that a building would not have been under fair headway and likely to have been completed within two years from now. This brings us up to the situation as it stands at the present moment. As soon as the session opened, as the old commission no longer was in existence by reason of its not having been continued by the Fifty-seventh Congress, and desiring that something should be done without delay, I introduced the following bill appropriating $2,000,000 for the purchase of a site, asking for the appointment by the President of three commissioners, and making it mandatory that they should report within sixty days:

A bill (H. R. 4103) to provide for the erection of a branch post-office in the city of New York.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint three commissioners, residents of New York City, to select a site in said city for a branch post-office, their report to be made within sixty days after they are named, in writing, to the Postmaster-General, who shall approve of the site chosen before purchase is closed; said commissioners to serve without compensation, but to be reimbursed for actual expenses incurred. The site selected shall front on a public street or streets on two sides, at least.

SEC. 2. That $2,000,000, or such less amount as may be needed for the purchase of site, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. A site having been secured, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, and the postmaster of New York City shall be authorized to act as a committee to select plans for a suitable building to be erected thereon. The cost of the building shall not exceed $3,000,000, and this amount, or such less sum as may be required, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated. The building shall be erected by contract under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Other bills were also introduced. As we are aware, it was decided that there should be no public buildings and grounds bill at this session. I had several talks with the Postmaster-General early in the session, and was in hopes that he would in his annual report make a special plea for a new post-office. In his report, however, issued in January, he merely recommends, on page 34, that action be taken by Congress on the report of the commission appointed to select a site for a new post-office building in the city of New York, which practically threw the matter back to where it was before. During the present session it further developed that the New York Central Railroad were desirous of also pushing their proposition and reaching a conclusion with the Government, and in place of selling a site were proposing to make an offer of suitable space for handling the mails at a rental of $90,000 per annum, or such less amount as might be agreed upon, and I understand that during January proper representations to this effect were made to the Postmaster-General.

As matters were urgent, I thought that it would be desirable to do something definite in connection with the affair and therefore on the 27th of January advised with various members of the New York delegation, and it was agreed that a meeting should be held February 2 in the committee room on Banking and Currency. This meeting was duly held, and a special committee of four, with myself as chairman, was named to report again to the full delegation on Friday, February 5. The committee named were Messrs. RIDER, GOLDFOGLE, DUNWELL, and myself. We held meetings on February 5 and February 6, discussed the various phases of the question very fully, and duly reported the following resolution, which was unanimous, at the meeting on Friday, February 5, in the same committee room:

Report to the New York delegation—Meeting held February 5, 1904, at 11 a. m., in committee room of Banking and Currency.

Your committee beg to report as follows:

They would recommend that the entire New York delegation should wait on the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; also consult at once with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. If it is the intention of the first-named committee to report a bill this session, we advise that said committee shall be requested to insert in said bill a section as follows:

"That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint three commissioners, residents of New York City, to purchase or acquire through condemnation proceedings a site in said city for a new post-office, their report in writing to be filed within ninety days after they are appointed with the Secretary of the Treasury. Said commissioners to serve without compensation, but to be reimbursed for actual expenses incurred. The site selected shall front on a public street or streets on two sides at least, and $2,000,000 or such less amount as may be needed for the acquirement of the site is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

If said committee are not likely to have a public buildings bill we deem it desirable to secure the sympathy and support of the chairman of the committee and request him to aid us with the chairman and the Committee on Appropriations to have this section incorporated in the sundry civil bill, or such other bill as may be decided upon as preferable.

The committee further recommend that a special committee of seven shall be appointed to wait upon the Speaker of the House of Representatives, Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON; also to advise with the leader of the House on the Republican side, Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE, and the leader on the Democratic side, Hon. JOHN S. WILLIAMS, with a view to securing the cooperation and support of these gentlemen, which will, if secured, go far to do away with the possibility of any personal Member raising any objection to this necessary and just legislation on behalf of New York City.

Your committee also deem it desirable that the entire New York delegation shall in due course wait on the President of the United States, advise him of their action in asking him to name this commission, and request him to aid their efforts to such extent as will be proper and justifiable on his part.

Your committee deem it good policy to leave the selection of a site to the commission that may be named by the President, rather than specify any special site. They also believe it wisdom to have the President name as members of the commission residents of New York City, as such men undoubtedly are better qualified than outsiders to know the needs and requirements of our citizens and determine with judgment the location of the site.

The report of the committee is unanimous.

W. H. DOUGLAS,
Fifteenth District.
IRA E. RIDER,
Fourteenth District.
HENRY M. GOLDFOGLE,
Ninth District.
CHAS. T. DUNWELL,
Third District.

Senators PLATT and DEPEW were invited to attend the Friday meeting, and Senator DEPEW was duly present. You will note that this report distinctly advised the appointment of a new commission to be named by the President, who were to be residents of New York City, authorized to purchase or acquire a site for a new post-office, and who were to make their report in writing within ninety days to the Secretary of the Treasury, and that $2,000,000 were appropriated for this purpose. The report was not adopted, but laid on the table for future consideration at the next meeting, which was to be held February 9.

At the February 5 meeting a further committee of seven was appointed, consisting of Messrs. DUNWELL, HARRISON, RIDER, GOLDFOGLE, SULZER, SHOBER, and myself, who were to wait on the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, also on the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and solicit their aid in any movement that might be made, and further to advise with the leaders on both sides of the House to secure their sympathy. This committee, or portions of the committee, duly made these requests of the gentlemen named. As I found that I would not be able to attend a meeting on the 9th of February, and as Mr. DUNWELL, Mr. SULZER, and others also could not be present, I wrote to all members of the committee and asked them to kindly postpone the proposed meeting.

I make this very plain so that it may be clearly understood that no meeting of the New York delegation was held after the meeting of Friday, February 5, and consequently no unanimous decision of any kind whatever could have been reached, as some gentlemen have claimed, and, in fact, the only resolution which the New York Members jointly considered was the one I have mentioned above. It appears, however, that some gentlemen, notwithstanding the request to postpone the February 9 proposed meeting held a meeting, and without any sanction, except such as would be warranted to be taken by those present, passed resolutions changing the status and indorsing the purchase of the Pennsylvania site at a cost of two millions. This, however, was personal action of the Members present. Some of the gentlemen who had agreed to the first report undoubtedly had changed their minds, which they had a perfect right to do, but that was no justification on their part in assuming that others had also altered their views.

As it was now very evident, in view of their being no public building and grounds bill, that it was necessary to take action, if anything was to be accomplished, through other committees, and as it was also clear that it was practically out of the question to secure an appropriation this session for a special site, according to the original plan, it was decided to endeavor to arrange, so far as the New York Central proposition was concerned, through some other committee, and as the Post-Office and Post-Roads Committee had not yet reported, a recommendation has been placed in this bill authorizing the Postmaster-General to lease suitable space for the necessary postal requirements at said station at a yearly rental of $90,000 or less, the Postmaster-General to have authority to act and secure the lease on the most favorable terms possible. This railroad does not propose giving any ground space, which they reserve for their own use, but will provide accommodations above the first floor for the post-office authorities, and the mails will be sent up by elevators as soon as discharged from the cars.

As I understand it, the entire New York delegation are in favor of this arrangement, and there is no good reason why it should not be concluded, and personally I am heartily in favor of the plan, and it is only to be hoped that the Postmaster-General will see to it that the interests of the Government are carefully protected in closing the details of lease, of which I have no doubt whatever. The Pennsylvania Railroad proposition has been that the Government should make a purchase of land, as stated heretofore, rather than to lease, and it has been suggested that a clause should be placed in the sundry civil bill authorizing said purchase for $2,000,000. A hearing was asked before said committee, and it was duly held on Wednesday, the 2d of March. Most of the New York delegation were present; also Senator DEPEW.

The result of this hearing appears to have occasioned considerable friction and, I regret to say, some misunderstanding. Also as it has led to the giving out of many somewhat misleading and incorrect statements to the New York press, it is desirable, therefore, to have in the RECORD an authentic statement, at least in part, of the important facts, and I give some in full, and in other cases partial, extracts taken from the official stenographer's report. I specially call attention to the statements made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER], by which it will be seen that he practically took the exact position that I did in reference to the Pennsylvania site, and advised against its purchase if other arrangements could be made.

I bring this point out prominently, as the New York papers did not do either myself or Mr. DUNWELL justice in this particular. Senator DEPEW made a long statement and gave a full and lucid description of what the New York Central proposed to do; which proposition, however, was really not before the committee. I do not give his remarks in full, as anyone interested can see them by calling on the committee, but I give such extracts as are specially pertinent to the question. I request attention to his statement that, taking 90 per cent of the total mail as coming to New York over the New York Central and the Pennsylvania railroads, the New York Central carries 60 per cent and the Pennsylvania only 40 per cent of the 90 per cent.

If this is correct, it certainly would show that if the space the New York Central proposes to lease will be sufficient for the next fifty years for the Government requirements, we do not require larger space at the Pennsylvania station unless the ratio of mail carried should alter very materially, which is not likely.

I mention this particularly as the proposed purchase of ground at the Pennsylvania terminus is very much larger than what is to be given by the New York Central, or, to quote from the Rider bill, 460 feet on Eighth avenue, with a depth of 640 feet. I give in full my own statement, so that it may be on record. I also give in full the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNWELL], who took practically the same ground that I did in the matter. Several other gentlemen spoke, but I do not incorporate their remarks, as they did not throw further special light on the subject, merely stating that they believed something should be done, and if no other solution could be reached the appropriation should be placed in the bill. The gentlemen from New York [Mr. SCUDDER and Mr. BASSETT] objected to transferring the Federal courts to an uptown building, and I beg to say that on reflection I fully agree with them as to this proposition. They should remain downtown, convenient to the business center and the offices of those who most frequently have to attend such courts.

I might call attention also to the remarks of Mr. WILSON, who referred to the extra facilities that should be secured for prompt delivery of mail between the substations by the pneumatic tube or other similar system, in which I fully concur. A careful revision of the entire hearing will really bring out the fact that the only substantial difference of any moment between the delegation was as to the question of lease or purchase of the proper facilities, which all admitted should be secured at the Pennsylvania terminus. It was clearly shown that to erect on the ground proposed, which is large, a suitable building at the Government expense, would certainly cost several millions of dollars. No special or definite information has ever been offered to show that the Department or the commission appointed ever made any special and concerted effort to secure by lease what space we desire from the Pennsylvania, although they may have done so lately. It seems to me that there is no question whatever but that such effort should be made and before we are called upon to face the alternate proposal. The United States Government pay the Pennsylvania Railway large sums of money yearly for the carrying of the mails, and it certainly is as much for the ultimate benefit and good of that railroad that a substation should be placed there as it is for the Government.

I can therefore hardly concede that the railroad would not meet the postal authorities in a proper spirit if they were approached, and that a settlement agreeable to all could not be arrived at, and I shall likely make this effort at the proper time and endeavor to have given to the Postmaster-General the necessary authority. It is admitted that probably four years at least will elapse in the case of purchase before the Government could start to build on the Pennsylvania site, therefore there is no reason to say that the securing of prompt facilities for New York is being delayed. It goes without saying, if these statements are correct, that no letter would pass through that post-office or substation for at least six years. It may be wisdom, as some say for an excuse in advocating what they know is not right, to take what you can get at times rather than secure nothing, but it is also cowardly, and there is no pressing demand that we must act at once, although understand that I am in favor of doing something and having no longer delay.

The Pennsylvania Railroad have not yet started to build their tunnel under the Hudson. They must then perfect the tunnel on the New York side to their station, put in the proper trackage, and prepare the ground. No one is more earnest or alive to the absolute necessity of finally securing a substation at each of these terminals than myself, and in any case I believe it would have been done in due course by the Department authorities under the usual recommendations and general yearly appropriation. There is a great difference, however, between a substation and a post-office building, even if the space occupied may not materially differ. It is most unfortunate that there was no public buildings and grounds bill this session, as I believe the committee would have given without hesitation a proper appropriation to secure an uptown branch in a desirable location, and I hope that all of us would have stood for this, but we are now forced apparently to abandon for twelve months at least our cherished hope and wish for a general post-office.

It is further evident that the railroad interests are now in the saddle and bound to subordinate all other interests to their own. Senator DEPEW, in his statement before the New York delegation on the 2d of February, very naively stated that the two railroads had now settled all their differences and were united and willing to give us what we wished, and therefore there was no reason why we should not get it, and since then anyone who appears to have had a desire to hold to the original plan has certainly not received much consideration. I have fully realized the position and done what I could to have harmonious action, believing that we would have justice from the House, and I have recognized that it was fair and proper to close with the New York Central, who now offered a reasonable proposition, as they required to have ample time to perfect their plans and were putting up the building.

The great cry, however, about prompt relief seems to have been entirely overlooked by those who were the most insistent upon it only a short time since. Granting that we arrange for one or both substations this year, we will have to wait four or five years before they can be used. Meanwhile, what has become of the great principle of humanitarianism, which my colleagues seemed to have suddenly overlooked? I should like to ask them if they have lost their interest in the men who are daily or weekly, as has been said by some, giving up their positions through loss of health, by reason of having to work in insanitary, dark, and damp surroundings, or crowded together in a sort of loft, called the "chicken coop," in the upper part of the old post-office? I would request attention to the RECORD and the very eloquent and earnest remarks of several gentlemen from New York as to the unfortunate position of these men.

I am interesting myself now, and will continue to do so while I am in Congress, for their relief. I incorporate copy of a letter I have addressed to the Postmaster-General on this subject, requesting that extra money shall be given the New York postmaster, so that he may provide some subbranches in the necessary places and take these men out of their present surroundings and place them where they can do their work properly.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, March 7, 1901.

MY DEAR SIR: I would call your attention to the overcrowded condition of the old New York post-office; to the fact that the men are obliged to work under great disadvantages; that certain sections of the building, it is said, are not in a sanitary condition, as the cellar; that the mail is piled up, especially during the rush times of the year, and much delay is caused through the want of space and delay in sorting; also, that men are crowded together in the upper part of the building.

I hope that you will take these matters into consideration and allow the postmaster at New York a proper extra amount of money this and every year from now forward, until new facilities are obtained, by large substations, so that he can hire at once several extra branch offices and relieve the pressure.

Your attention will oblige,

Respectfully, yours,

WM. H. DOUGLAS.

Hon. HENRY C. PAYNE, Postmaster-General.

I have lived in New York all my life and know as well as other citizens the direction in which the great tide of humanity daily ebbs and flows and where the immense retail and wholesale business houses are situated, and consequently a post-office should be placed to do what it is expected to accomplish, and I would be derelict in my duty, false to my principles, and devoid of honesty if I were afraid to come forward and state facts, give proper details, and then allow the question to be decided on its merits. I would say, and can not do it too strongly, it would be almost a crime to spend seven millions of the Government's money on such a site as is proposed. It would be the same as if you placed a post-office in Washington at the river front or some other outside position, rather than on Pennsylvania avenue, accessible and convenient to the people. Few citizens of New York will ever know they have a post-office if it is placed on Eighth avenue. A workshop, a sorting place, is not a post-office, no matter how desirable and necessary it may be.

The New York Central branch will be upstairs; the people will not visit it largely. The ground floor, always the most valuable for rental for any purpose, is to be owned by the railroad. The Pennsylvania site may be surrounded by a freight depot, a storage place for cars, locomotive houses, etc., blocked by trucks and wagons, and a hundred other nuisances attendant on a great central station, to say nothing of the likely noise, as I understand the portion of the Pennsylvania site which is to be used by the public will be at a very considerable distance from the proposed site. It is very easy to swim with the tide, as it were, and especially is this wiser when an unknowing public sentiment may be against you, and to accept what may come with complacency, but that should not be the attitude of anyone with convictions on any subject, who believes it best to stand by principles if right, and who would rather fight for them than run away. I have taken the latter course, knowing full well that it would be criticised; but in due time I am satisfied that my statements will prove correct, and I am willing to abide by the result.

If it is a crime to say that if we are to have a post-office we should have it in a proper location, I am agreeable to so state and take the consequences, while advocating as strongly as anyone the relief necessary at both places by substations, and I believe that every man in the delegation will admit the correctness at least of this position, and I sincerely hope that every one will continue to fight for a new central post-office until we secure our just rights for our city. The amount of sorting that has to be done at railroad centers or elsewhere is considerably exaggerated, and I should like to know the amount in percentage of mail that comes in over these two railroads or that leaves our city which is sorted elsewhere, so that it really reaches the railroad station in bags marked and requiring no extra handling. All the through mails from the Orient, Australia, New Zealand, and other places, and destined for Europe, do not require sorting.

The same remarks apply to the mails from foreign countries, coming across the ocean and going to the West, and again across the Pacific. They are all in special bags, which are not broken. The local sorting is the great question. I made some extended remarks on this question Tuesday, April 29, 1902, so that I will not again go fully into the matter. I have, however, been endeavoring to study the question of proper mail distribution in a great city, so far as local requirements are concerned, and have consulted others, and there is no doubt whatever that to-day we are far behind in this particular, and not abreast of other large cities. A careful investigation leads me to think that really the proper solution of the entire question of local delivery is not expensive plants in any central position, but rather a proper central building for sorting, and then a rapid and quick delivery to the public through numerous branch stations properly placed throughout the city.

All these stations should be connected with each other and with the several railroad terminals and central post-office by pneumatic-tube or other proper system. They should have access or be placed very close to the underground railroad, with its many branches and arteries throughout the city. It should be possible for anyone at a small extra cost to have sent from one section of the city to the other by the tube method or otherwise a letter and have the answer come back within a very short period. If we could get in yearly appropriation, subject to the use of the New York postmaster, say, one-half the yearly output that is proposed at the Pennsylvania Railroad if we purchase, or, say, $250,000, so as to give us some fifteen to twenty new stations, it will do more for us than anything else to bring about a final solution of this problem. The city should also be divided into districts—north, south, east, and west—and letters directed accordingly to save time in delivery.

Our post-office and the service generally should be taken entirely out of the sphere of politics and be run strictly on business principles and for the people's good. [Applause.] I do not know that the Department has been niggardly in appropriating money for New York City, but if what I hear is correct they have been. A chief of division told me that New York did not need more than three or four deliveries a day, but I am pleased to say strong protests by myself and others prevented the carrying out of such an idea. We all know that there is hardly a substation in New York where the men are not doing more work than they should, and that they are underpaid; also that the poor substitutes are hardly able to make an approach to a living while they are serving their apprenticeship and trying to become carriers. They are entitled to a fair guaranty, say not less than six or seven hundred dollars a year.

At this point I wish to make a statement that I believe that in no city in America is there a more earnest, efficient, and conscientious corps of men than are employed as carriers, clerks, superintendents, and in other duties under the postal necessities. They serve in all kinds of weather, there are few men who prove dishonest, and from a personal knowledge and acquaintanceship with many I can bear testimony to their worth, their merit, and loyalty to their service, and they should be carefully considered in recommendations they make for improvements in the service and for increased compensation. I believe that the salary of a carrier should be raised at once to not less than $1,200 per annum maximum after service for such number of years as might be fixed, and then after each further five years of service he should have a further reasonable increase in compensation. I do not believe that they should be subject to loss of full pay through sickness, unless it extends beyond, say, ten days or two weeks.

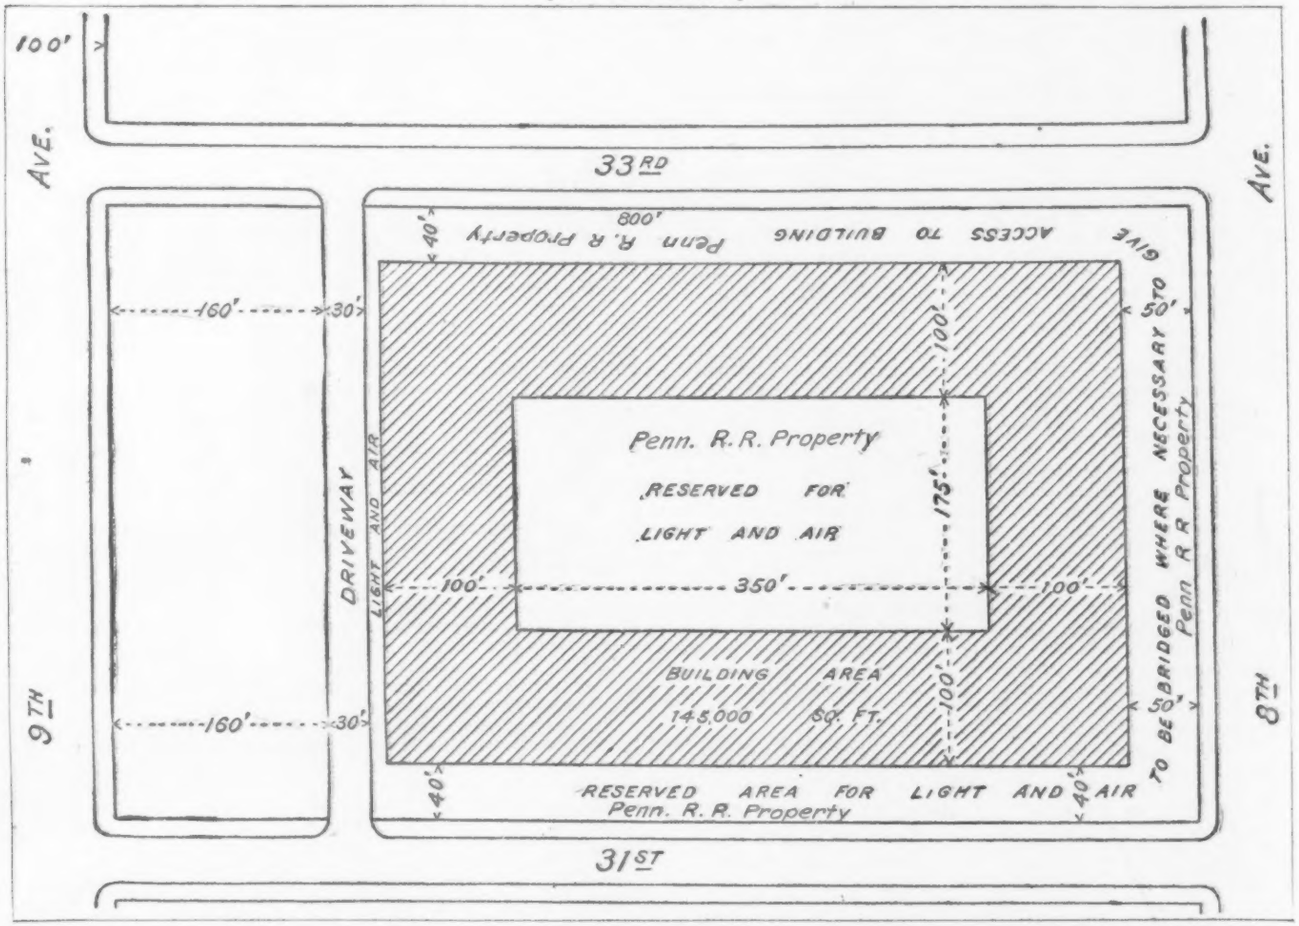
The pay of clerks, superintendents, etc., also should be advanced, and the carriers and clerks should have the right to insist upon not being placed to do their work in unsanitary buildings without proper light and ventilation.

If we paid two millions for the Pennsylvania site and four millions for a building, which is conservative, even if cheaply put up with brick four stories high, as the space is large, and say one million for fittings, it means seven millions, which at 4 per cent interest is $280,000. Then with the heating, lights, elevators, etc., the total would foot up to probably $400,000 a year rental.

The Senator from New York says, and justly, the land around Forty-second street is worth three times the cost of land on the Pennsylvania site, and yet the New York Central is agreeable to grant us all necessary space with equipments for $90,000 or less. Certainly then by a proper bargain we should secure what we need and more room at the same price or less. In fact, they should give us two to two and one-half times as much space for the same amount. This is simply a business proposition, and we should not allow ourselves to be run away with by foolish clamor or sentiment or something worse.

Also, as has been pointed out, a larger percentage of mails come in and go out over the New York Central. Should the Government, therefore, simply because the Pennsylvania Railroad desires to sell and not to lease, be forced to expend likely three hundred and twenty-five to three hundred and fifty thousand dollars yearly and permanently in place of, say, nominally, $75,000? Or should we require the railroad to meet us fairly and thus save this great difference each year? With honest convictions I have, therefore, opposed the purchase proposition before I saw the plans of the Pennsylvania Railroad and knew exactly what they intended giving us in the way of ground and facilities, but I am doubly convinced of the justice of the position after having inspected their plan, and believe that a great mistake will be made if the Government agrees to their present proposition.

It appears in place of selling us a piece of ground some 460 feet on Eighth avenue, running some 650 feet west toward Ninth avenue, and between Thirty-first and Thirty-third streets, as was stated, they really propose something entirely different, and desire to retain for themselves and railroad purposes 50 feet back from the Eighth avenue front and 40 feet back on each of the side streets named; also, to hold as railroad property the central portion of the site, some 175 by 350 feet, for light and air, as their tracks will be under the entire space. Thus the property sold to the Government will be entirely surrounded on three sides by railroad property, and at the back of the site by a private road to be opened, not a public street, and beyond that the railroad yards, etc. Also, what would ordinarily be the center of the building will be held by the railroad. In fact, we would only be buying a square within a square.



It is well known that the value of any landed property is mostly dependent upon its ground space and the easement or ownership of the street front, and the present property is no exception to the rule. If this frontage is taken away it becomes a serious question what would be the value of the site under discussion; but I hazard the opinion that it could not be sold for one-fourth the amount asked—$2,000,000. The Pennsylvania Railroad grants the privilege of building bridges over the 50 feet on Eighth avenue and the 40 feet on Thirty-first and Thirty-third streets, to allow of entrance to the building, and bridges can also be built over the central reserve ground if desired, to allow communication between one section of the building to the other, say north and south, and east and west.

The railroad, again, do not agree to build a foundation for the building, as I was lead to expect, but only a retaining wall around the space sold. I am of the opinion few, if any, of my colleagues from New York, or those who have advocated this purchase because they wished, as they say, to secure something, have been aware of these facts, and I will add that it appears to me, as soon as they are made acquainted with the true position and status of the matter, they will see the necessity of changing their position and help to defeat, unless radical changes are made in the proposition, what must appeal to all as an attempt to give the Government an unsuitable, undesirable, and costly site for the reasons given.

Under the head of personal privilege, I desire, in conclusion, to state that my only wish in giving these actual and indisputable facts has been to do so without feeling or prejudice as regards the position of others and without any intention to impugn their motives or good faith, preferring to leave all differences of opinion to be accounted for by the honest divergence of views which all men may hold; and yet, by reason of the criticism of the New York press—unwarranted statements, and in some instances actual erroneous facts—it appears well to place in the RECORD a fairly complete history of New York post-office issues to date. I had intended to deal in a few stronger statements, but have preferred leaving the actual facts to speak for themselves. Throughout the controversy and as regards my future position, I would add that I am only actuated by a desire to do what I consider clearly a duty and to accomplish what may be best for our city and due to our Government.

I am not interested directly or indirectly in sites or systems of any kind leading up to the improvemen of our postal facilities. These matters I am satisfied to leave to the Department and such commissions as may be named, or to be decided by the action of the committees of the House themselves. Fearlessly, however, will I, in this instance and in all others, do what in my judgment is the right thing, without regard to any consideration except my conscience and obligations to my oath of office. [Applause.]

There is no place to-day in this country where postal facilities are more needed than in the city of New York, and it not alone affects the city of New York, but it affects the whole country, because New York is the great distributing point. Now, it is absolutely impossible in the old post-office building to properly distribute the mail. It is wholly inadequate. It is old and dilapidated. It is unsanitary, and the report of the commission, which is before this committee and before Congress, conclusively proves that better postal facilities are needed in the city of New York.

Now, the question is, What is the best way? I am frank to say, Mr. Chairman, that for one I was opposed to this site. I was opposed to what this commission did. I hoped the commission would have selected a site and recommended the building of a new post-office, and left the old post-office as a substation. But the commission did not do that. It recommended the purchase of a piece of property at Eighth avenue and Thirty-first street.

Mr. SULZER. The simple question, in my judgment, for this committee is whether or not you are willing to give us this two millions. We come before this committee a united delegation. We come before this committee voicing the sentiment of the people of New York unanimously. We come before this committee voicing the sentiment of all the newspapers of New York City. Every newspaper in New York is clamoring for this appropriation of two millions in order to go on with this work. (From pages 7 and 8.)

The CHAIRMAN. What do you think of the Pennsylvania Company making the same proposition to the Government that the New York Central has made?

Mr. SULZER. If that is satisfactory, it is entirely satisfactory to me.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you not think it is better?

Mr. SULZER. I want to say, however, I do not speak for the Pennsylvania Railroad. I am speaking for my constituents. Now, if the Pennsylvania Railroad would make such a proposition to the Government, and it was thought by the Government that the proposition of the Pennsylvania Railroad would be fairer and better, that would be entirely satisfactory, in my opinion, to the people of the city of New York. I have not heard, I want to say, a single objection from any newspaper or from anybody competent to speak for the people of the city of New York to the proposition of the New York Central. I think that is a very good and fair proposition. I think that it will ultimately rebound immensely to the advantage of the Government, and perhaps, as you say, if we could get the Pennsylvania Railroad Company to make the same kind of a proposition it would be better. I am frank to say that, in my opinion, the New York Central proposition is a fairer, and better, and more advantageous proposition, so far as finality is concerned, than the Pennsylvania proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you say as to the time; that is, whether it will be one year or two years or three years before the Pennsylvania Railroad Company will deliver mail at this proposed site?

Mr. SULZER. That is a very hard question to answer. They have just begun to build the tunnel.

A VOICE. Three years.

Mr. SULZER. It is a very hard question to answer. They have just begun to build the tunnel. It may be two years, it may be three years, it may be four years, but they are going ahead very rapidly. I know it is the intention of the Pennsylvania Railroad people to finish that tunnel and build that substation and depot there just as quickly as possible. (From pages 9 and 10.)

Mr. SULZER. If I could have the assurance of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company—speaking just for myself—if I could have the assurance of the Pennsylvania Railroad now, that they would put into the Post-Office and Post-Roads Committee appropriation bill the same facilities at their terminus as the New York Central is going to do, I would be willing to accept it. As I say, Mr. Chairman, I represent no one here but my constituents. They are clamoring for better postal facilities; they need better postal facilites. It is a crying shame to this Government that we have got such an old, unhealthy, dilapidated, broken-down post-office building in New York City. It does not compare with the post-offices in several of the cities ten times as small as New York City, and New York City has grown immensely in the last few years.

If we can get the Pennsylvania Railroad to agree to the same proposition as the New York Central has made, why then there is no favoritism, and it seems to me it simplifies the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you think about the Government entering into partnership with the railroad company in purchasing a site for the company to construct a building on?

Mr. SULZER. As I say, I have never been in favor of this proposition. I have always been against it. I fought against it in every Congress. What I wanted was a new post-office building in the neighborhood of Forty-second street and use the old post-office building as simply a down-town distributing center. I could not succeed. I could not have my way. Now I am willing to take the best I can get. But I want it before this session of Congress adjourns.

[Statement of Senator DEPEW, March 2, 1904, before the Committee on Appropriations.]

Senator DEPEW. Mr. Chairman, if this was simply a railway proposition I would not be here, but I am here in my official capacity, representing the State of New York, and am specially interested as a resident for many years of the city of New York. We have always been handicapped in New York since the stations got so far distant from the post-office, by reason of the length of cartage that it requires. This has led to the formation of substations. There is a substation established. The Government found it necessary to establish it or it could not transact its business near the Grand Central Depot. (From pages 21, 22, and 23.)

Senator DEPEW. Now, the Pennsylvania Railroad have projected, and the Pennsylvania is a rival of the New York Central, but I am just as anxious to have Pennsylvania facilities provided as I am that they shall be provided over the New York Central. The Pennsylvania have projected one of the most extraordinary developments for a complete railway of modern times. They propose, in order to get into the city of New York proper, to build a tunnel under the Hudson River, then across the island of Manhattan, and then across the East River, to come out upon Long Island somewhere in Brooklyn. Now, their proposition, in its practical features as to the receipt and delivery of the mail, is the same except that they propose to convey the land in fee because they have taken such vast spaces over there, and of course the land is nothing in value compared with that which is next to Fifth avenue, as is the New York Central location. With the exception of Broad and Wall streets, there is no location in the world now where land demands and receives readily so much per square foot as it does between Fourth avenue and Forty-fourth street and Fifth avenue and along that line of territory. They propose there to build a structure over the tracks and have the same methods of receipt and delivery. Now, why should there (probably intended) not be two is the question that naturally occurs to the economical mind.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us ask you there, Senator, do I understand it now to be that the Government should buy the site and pay two millions for it?

Senator DEPEW. That is, they buy the surface site. The underground site belongs to the railway.

The CHAIRMAN. And pay two millions for it?

Senator DEPEW. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is to construct the building?

Senator DEPEW. The Government constructs the building.

Ninety per cent of the mail which comes locally, which comes there for this vast distribution, goes over the two roads in the proportion of 60 to the New York Central and 40 to the Pennsylvania of the 90 per cent.

[Statement of Mr. DOUGLAS, March 2, 1904, before the Committee on Appropriations.]

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in rising I would say we have a statement in New York City that no man should speak after Senator DEPEW, and it is a very wise statement, and a man is usually wise who respects and adopts it. Notwithstanding, however, I would like to say a few things in connection with this post-office matter. The statements made by Senator DEPEW are correct. The growth of the city is wonderful. He has outlined all the facts to you so conclusively, so pleasantly, and so honestly I need not refer to these points. We had a commission appointed two years ago, and I was largely instrumental in having that commission named.

I desired at the time to have New York men placed on the commission. I was not successful because the chairman of the committee at that time felt that he did not desire to be criticised, and consequently he settled on men who were not New Yorkers, although, as we all know, the most honorable and upright men that we can find in the Government to-day. These gentlemen had in view this plan when they were named on the commission. They intended to buy a piece of ground anywhere between Fourteenth street and Forty-second street, and between Sixth avenue and Lexington avenue—that is, in the heart of the city, the section to-day that is the most eminent in business and other ways, and where the population of the city concentrates and where they desire to go for their mail, for postal requirements, for buying money orders, and all facilities that go with a post-office.

The subway in New York, which you gentlemen all know about, is to be built. It is a great undertaking, almost as great as the New York Central and the Pennsylvania plans, and some say it is even greater. That subway will connect practically all parts of New York City, and the intention was to place this building adjacent to or over that subway, with a view that the mails coming from the railroad centers and from all other directions should be run into this central building, with the object of concentrating there the entire mail service, relieving the downtown business. However, time went on and this other solution came up, which seemed feasible and desirable, and they were given consideration by Postmaster-General Payne, and you know all about his recommendations, and therefore I need not allude to them.

I wish to say, however, I shall give up with extreme reluctance the first idea and scheme. I still believe and wish to say very forcibly that that is even to-day what New York City wants, and I believe ultimately you will have to give New York City just what I am now proposing. I am in full accord, however, and full sympathy with everything that Senator DEPEW has said with reference to the New York Central Railroad. They propose—that is, the New York Central—to have a building built on that site, and they will hold the easement on the ground. They will then give us an advantageous station for the distribution of the mails which come in by that railroad. I think we can say, therefore, that every man and all the citizens of New York are thoroughly in favor of that station being accorded to New York City.

I do not agree with the Senator that that station will ever be of any great value to the public, except as a distributing station; but we need it, and we must have it, and therefore I shall dismiss that by saying it is simply a question now, you may say, of how cheap can this Government secure the proper accommodations from the New York Central? It is simply a question of bargain solely, and I am absolutely and entirely in accord with the necessity of having it. I would like now to come to the question of the Pennsylvania Railroad, and I should not now have spoken of it if some of the others had not given me a cue in relation to that matter. The proposition is somewhat different. I wish to say that it is over on the west side of the city, in the tenement-house section.

The Pennsylvania Railroad is spending vast sums of money there, and they are going to have their yards as well as passenger and other accommodations, and it is a very grave question whether it is desirable or necessary or wise to buy ground at that location. I understand that they are asking $2,000,000, and then I further understand that it is probably essential that a building should be placed there by the United States Government. The area of ground they propose to give us is very large. The cost of that building, I am told, as proposed, is about five millions. That is a large sum of money, gentlemen. It would make the cost of that building seven millions, including the site. This means a very heavy rental per annum. It further means the expenditure of large amounts of money for janitor, heating, and other service of various kinds.

And again it is an open question as to the adaptability of that building for any purpose except a general distribution of the mail that comes over that railroad. If we, however, had a general post-office placed anywhere in the location that I mentioned, which you must have, because the city grows, as the Senator says, almost over night, and this is our only chance to do that, and although three or four years off, we will then have a suitable general station. Looking at it from this point of view, if we put up a general post-office and spend several millions of dollars, we will then have an ornament to the great city of New York. We will then have a grand building. We will have something that the citizens will look upon with satisfaction, and we will have a building besides which will be useful and can be utilized very largely for the interests of the city in other ways. It can be used for Federal requirements, for our courts, for internal-revenue offices, and for purposes of that kind which are essential, and as essential as the requirements of the post-office.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Do you mean it will be necessary for the post-office alone?

Mr. DOUGLAS. It strikes me the ground they are offering us—that is, the Pennsylvania Railroad—is very large. I wish to say again that putting it in that location, this great central building I propose, in a part of the city where no one who knows anything about New York City would place it, with all deference to the gentlemen who have selected that site, will mean hiding it; but if you place it in a central location you will then have a building that in ten years will be worth fifteen millions to the United States Government. I only wish to bring these points out because I want to call the attention of the committee to them carefully, not because I am not just as much in favor of it—that is, a substation at the Pennsylvania Railroad—and I want to emphasize that very much, because I favor a substation at the point of the Pennsylvania; but I think this committee, as is their duty, should give most earnest consideration to the facts whether the rental is not more desirable than the purchase and erection of an enormous building.

I consider that for the expenditure of perhaps $50,000 to $75,000 a year the Pennsylvania should undoubtedly give us equal accommodations to what the Senator says the New York Central will give us, and it is all we want to arrive at. I do not desire to bar the door for the next ten years so that the New York delegation can not go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds or come to this committee and ask them for further consideration, which we might do if we shut the door by the expenditure of this enormous amount of money, which I also want to call to the committee's attention will not be spent for perhaps another five or six years—three years, anyway—because it can not be built earlier, and that station can not be erected sooner.

The United States Government can not take charge and complete that building under four years, and I say five and six; therefore I simply want to add that I hope the committee will use some moral suasion, which they may be able to accomplish through the Postmaster-General or otherwise, on the Pennsylvania Railroad, to consider whether they will or not give us what we must have and the same as the New York Central location by lease and which I strongly advocate—to give us by lease, not purchase, what we must have, what we should have, what the people of New York demand, and what our friend SULZER says the papers are all for—that is, we also want the Pennsylvania Railroad site.

Mr. SULZER. Will you pardon me just a moment? Is not the matter you are talking about an extraneous matter that ought to come up in a separate bill entirely?

Mr. DOUGLAS. No; it is just what you were talking about, although I am putting it in a different way to suit myself. You spoke just as much on this proposition from your standpoint as I did and practically advocated the very thing that I am now advocating, that it may be desirable, may be more necessary, and may be more effective in the long run for the city of New York to hire that site, taking such ground as may be necessary and desirable for them to obtain from the Pennsylvania Railroad, and practically the same proposition which the Senator from New York has stated the New York Central is going to concede.

I personally will take pleasure in standing with the New York delegation firmly on the proposition, and with what the judgment of the committee may decide is best for us, but I think it is my duty, in fact I know it is, to call the attention of the committee to this point, and I still believe that a rental at a proper valuation, not putting an enormous building there, at an enormous cost, and shutting the doors as I say and barring us from further calls on this House, is perhaps more desirable and more essential than purchasing this site.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand the gentleman to say that in his judgment the better plan would be to try to effect such an arrangement with the Pennsylvania Railroad as is suggested by the New York Central, and build your post-office building at a point up town or nearer the heart of the city.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The central point. Yes; that is my idea.

Mr. DUNWELL addressed the Committee on Appropriations and said (March 2, 1904):

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee: We all seem to be agreed on the main features of this proposition, but there are a few little points about which we seem to be slightly at variance. So far as I am concerned, I believe in the arguments which have been made by Mr. DOUGLAS with regard to the Government building at some central point in the city of New York, which should be sufficient for the uses of the great city as a receptacle and distributing point for all mail, also for the accommodation of many other departments of the Government in the city of New York which are now suffering for lack of space.

I agree with all that has been said by the gentleman who has spoken in regard to these two terminals. I think we should have a substation well equipped at both of these points, but I fear that for a large appropriation to be made for the building of a Government building on this site proposed by the Pennsylvania Railroad it would then be many years before New York City really gets the great central Government building which is essential to all its interests.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will you pardon an interruption?

Mr. DUNWELL. Certainly.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. If we do not acquire the site now proposed and offered, how many years do you suppose it will take before we will ever, through Congressional action, get this desired large Government building?

Mr. DUNWELL. I do not think it will take more time to secure a great central building in the city of New York for all the Government purposes than it would take to secure what is wanted at the Pennsylvania site. It has been estimated it would take six years before such a building could be completed and be ready for use. I believe we could complete a building at some central point in the city of New York before that time. I do not believe the question of time enters much into this, and if we erect, as has been suggested, this building on the Pennsylvania site—if we should spend seven millions in the erection of this building on one side of the city, away from its center, I question whether we would not have to be content with that building for fifty years to come, and it would not cost more than that to build this central building which has been mentioned here, at a point where it would be of use to the city for other purposes as well as this.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask the gentleman whether he does not think it advisable to go slow with this matter and try to secure such an arrangement with the Pennsylvania Railroad as has been secured, or possibly can be secured, with the New York Central and put this building where it ought to be?

Mr. DUNWELL. That, Mr. Chairman, would be my idea.

Mr. SULZER. Then you are opposed to any legislation for better postal facilities?

Mr. DUNWELL. I am not. No, do not accuse me of anything of that kind.

Mr. SULZER. Then you are opposed to any legislation for any better postal facilities this year?

Mr. DUNWELL. Not at all. I am very much in favor of it if it can be done in the right way.

The CHAIRMAN. I suggest that you gentlemen settle these questions in other ways.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON].

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, some years ago, under a Republican Administration, this Government began the experiment of delivering to and collecting mail from people living outside cities. This experiment has developed into a system involving the employment of thousands of rural carriers.

To perform his duties the rural carrier must be qualified by honesty, intelligence, energy, and physical endurance. He must travel about 25 miles every day in all kinds of weather. He must keep and feed at least two horses and must own conveyances, harness, and equipment necessary to the performance of his business.

For his own services, the use of his outfit, and the maintenance thereof he is now paid a salary of $600 a year.

The element of equipment expense being an essential factor in considering what a carrier actually receives for his services, I have asked the carriers of the Fourth district of Michigan to inform me as to the length of their routes, number of houses served, horses and vehicles kept, original cost of outfit, the probable life thereof, cost of grain, hay, repairs, horseshoeing, and veterinary services.

An average of the reports of 124 carriers is presented in the following table:

Route number	124
Average length of route (miles)	24.8
Average number houses served	110
Average number horses kept	2
Average number vehicles kept	2
Average original cost of outfit	$337.00
Estimated life of outfit (years)	3
Average cost of grain:
Per bushel	$0.42
Annual total	$115.24
Average cost of hay:
Per ton	$9.37
Annual total	$77.58
Average cost of repair outfit	$16.23
Average cost of horseshoeing	$23.44
Average cost of veterinary services	$7.25

TOTAL.

Annual deterioration in outfit (33⅓ per cent)	$112.33
Annual cost of grain	115.24
Annual cost of hay	77.58
Annual cost of repairs to outfit	16.23
Annual cost of horseshoeing	23.44
Annual cost of veterinary services	7.25
Total cost	352.07

These tables show that rural carriers in the Fourth district of Michigan receive less than $250 a year over and above expenses which the Government requires them to incur, and the Fourth district of Michigan is probably a fair illustration.

Eighty cents a day is not fair pay for the service required to be rendered. The Government requires men who apply for this service to pass examinations to test their competency and requires them to have a certain equipment.

Constant, systematic hard work is required of them, and they are charged with important responsibility.

The facts themselves are sufficient argument. [Loud applause.]

And then, on motion of Mr. OVERSTREET, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOUTELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 13521, the post-office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

POST-OFFICE BUILDING, NEW YORK CITY.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., For the acquisition of a site for a post-office building in the city of New York, State of New York, comprising a frontage of 400 feet on the west side of Eighth avenue and a depth of 640 feet on Thirty-first and Thirty-third streets, to a street to be hereafter made, such site to be subject to the right of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company to use for platforms and trackage under a plane 20 feet below the curb line of the adjoining streets: Provided, however, That such use does not interfere with the erection of supports necessary in the construction of a suitable post-office building, $2,000,000.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he have the privilege of introducing this bill at this time and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I take it that it does not require unanimous consent to introduce the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that under the rule all bills for public buildings would go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Now, if the bill was before the House, which it is not, it would be quite competent for the House on motion to refer the bill to any committee it chooses to refer it to. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] asks unanimous consent that this bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, in that connection I desire to state to the House the reason I ask that this bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations is because that committee has had a hearing on this matter and it is now pending before that committee.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, may I make this inquiry, whether it would affect at all the authority of the Committee on Appropriations in reporting an item not warranted by law?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if this goes to the Committee on Appropriations that committee would hold it, subject to the same rules that any other committee would hold it, for a report or otherwise. Is there objection?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. SULZER. Certainly.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should like to ask the object of making that reference? I understand that this bill is practically before that committee to-day. We had a hearing on it March 2, and we were all present and discussed the bill.

Mr. SULZER. The reason I am introducing the matter in the nature of a bill to-day is to bring the matter more formally before that committee.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not consider it necessary to make that reference.

Mr. SULZER. Others think it is necessary. Members of the Committee on Appropriations think it is necessary. This is identically the same bill as the amendment previously offered by me to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should like to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. SULZER. Certainly.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would like to ask the gentleman if at the hearing on March 2 the gentleman from New York did not state that he was opposed to that purchase, that he did not believe in the purchase of the Pennsylvania site, and that he thought it was better to lease?

Mr. SULZER. On the contrary, I stated that I was in favor of this purchase.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the gentleman will give me time I will read his remarks.

Mr. SULZER. Oh, I have not time for the gentleman to read my remarks.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think he will see that he said what I state he did, and very plainly, too.

Mr. SULZER. If an arrangement can be made, I said, for a lease, I have no objection to that. I do not think it can be arranged, and consequently this is the only relief I can see at the present time that we can get. Therefore I am in favor of it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have before me a plan of this building.

Mr. SULZER. Put that in the RECORD.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wish to say also to the gentleman from New York that the bill does not give correctly or properly or fairly what is intended to be conveyed to the Government by the plan of the Pennsylvania Railroad. It says the ground is 460 feet by 640 feet, and the plan distinctly shows something entirely different. Therefore, unless that plan goes with the bill, I consider there is a material difference, and I shall object.

Mr. SULZER. I have no objection to the plan going with the bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the plan goes with the bill, I have no objection.

Mr. SULZER. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman amends his request for unanimous consent, requesting that the bill go to the Committee on Appropriations accompanied by the plan referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, for the present, at least, I shall object.

Mr. SULZER. That comes with very bad grace from Chicago.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 13212, which is reported as a substitute for the bill H. R. 8130.

Be it enacted, etc., That Dayton, Ohio, be, and is hereby, established as a port of delivery in the customs collection district of New Orleans, La., and that the privileges of the seventh section of the act approved June 10, 1880, governing the immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement, be, and are hereby, extended to said port; and there shall be appointed a surveyor of customs to reside at Dayton, who shall receive a salary to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. COOPER of Texas, indefinitely, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill just introduced by me, with the plan suggested by the gentleman from New York, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman that the rules provide how bills shall be introduced and how they shall be referred; and while under a proper motion a bill might be brought before the House under the rules after the reading of the Journal for a change of reference, that is the only way under the rule it can come unless it be by unanimous consent. So that the introduction of the bill and its reference by motion under the rules would not have a status.

Mr. SULZER. Would not a motion be in order now, Mr. Speaker, to refer the bill and plan to the Committee on Appropriations?

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House, and the only way it could come before the House, under the rule, is by reference through the box, and then, under the rule, to go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. When introduced, reference can be changed by unanimous consent, and it can be done now by unanimous consent, both as to introduction and reference.

Mr. SULZER. Then, I ask unanimous consent that the bill and plan be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I had made a motion previous to the Chair laying before the House the report of the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

The SPEAKER. That is equivalent to an objection. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 2, line 10, after the word "War," to strike out:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 18, after the word "bridge," to strike out "or appurtenant works;" and at the end of the section to insert the following proviso:

ESTATE OF WILLIAM A. HAMMOND.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 1665) to amend the act approved March 15, 1878, entitled "An act for the relief of William A. Hammond, late Surgeon-General of the Army."

The Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I thought that Surgeon-General Hammond died.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill declares that he is dead, and that the payment shall be made to his widow.

Mr. KEAN. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an amendment. The amendment may as well be read first.

Mr. KEAN. Very well. The amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, in lines 10 and 11, to strike out the words "his appointment and retirement under said act, on August 27, A. D. 1879" and insert "February 17, 1899;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of section 2 of the act entitled "An act for the relief of William A. Hammond, late Surgeon-General of the Army," approved March 15, 1878, as provides that said Hammond shall not be entitled to pay while on the retired list of the Army be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the said Hammond shall be entitled to the pay of a brigadier-general of the Army on the retired list from the date of February 17, 1899, up to the date of his death, January 5, 1900, the same to be paid to Esther D. Hammond, his widow.

Mr. SCOTT. What was the request of the Senator from New Jersey?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey demanded the reading of the report. The report will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. SCOTT on the 10th instant, and read as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1665, to amend the act approved March 15, 1878, entitled "An act for the relief of William A. Hammond, late Surgeon-General of the Army," report that they have considered the same, and respectfully recommend its passage after it has been amended as follows:

Strike out all after the word "of," in line 10, to and including the word "nine," in line 12, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "February 17, 1899."

A similar bill was favorably reported in the Fifty-fifth and Fifty-Seventh Congresses, and attention is respectfully invited to the accompanying copy of both of these reports.

[Senate Report No. 2960, Fifty-seventh Congress, second session.]

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6580) to amend an act approved March 15, 1878, entitled "An act for the relief of William A. Hammond, late Surgeon-General of the Army," have examined the same and report:

Under the provisions of the act of March 15, 1878, which is sought to be amended by this bill, Dr. William A. Hammond, late Surgeon-General of the Army, who, in 1864, had been dishonorably discharged from the service under sentence of a general court-martial, was restored to his former rank as Surgeon-General of the Army, with the rank of brigadier-general, and placed on the retired list of the Army by the orders of the President of the United States, "without any pay or allowances whatever, past, present, or future."

Doctor Hammond was at that time a wealthy man, with a considerable income from his profession, and did not ask for any pay or allowances, largely for the reason, perhaps, that he was not in need of the same, his principal object at that time being that his record should be cleared. Subsequently misfortunes overtook him, his wealth dwindled away, and old age coming on he made application to the Fifty-fifth Congress for an amendment to the said act of March 15, 1878, so as to permit him to receive the pay due an officer of his rank on the retired list for the future. Bills were introduced in both Houses of the Fifty-fifth Congress for that purpose, the Senate bill being numbered 5069, and the bill in the House of Representatives being numbered 11241, third session Fifty-fifth Congress.

Both of these bills were favorably reported from the Committee on Military Affairs of both Houses. The report of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs was No. 1684, and sets out the salient facts in reference to the case quite fully and clearly. For the purpose of giving a full history of the proceedings in reference to this matter that report is hereto attached, marked "Exhibit A," and made a part of this report.

The bill in that Congress passed the Senate and was favorably reported from the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives by the present chairman of that committee in the present Congress. The House bill was also reported favorably by the Committee on Military Affairs of the House. (See H. Repts. Nos. 2220 and 2319, 3d sess. 55th Cong.)

Neither bill, however, passed the House of Representatives, and nothing has since occurred in the case until the introduction of the bill which is here under consideration. In the meantime, to wit, on the 5th of January, 1900, Doctor Hammond died, and the present bill has for its beneficiary his widow, Esther D. Hammond.

The bill proposes to pay to Mrs. Hammond the pay to which Doctor Hammond would have been entitled as a brigadier-general on the retired list, from the date of his retirement, on August 27, 1879, to the date of his death, on the 5th of January, 1900.

Your committee, taking into consideration the meritorious features of this case and the equities in favor of Doctor Hammond, are not willing to go beyond the recommendations of the committee of the Fifty-fifth Congress, above referred to, which recommendations were in accord with the request of Doctor Hammond made at that time. Your committee are willing to grant to his widow the same measure of relief as was proposed to be granted to Doctor Hammond himself in his lifetime by the Fifty-fifth Congress. It is believed by your committee that the relief to be granted to Mrs. Hammond should date from the date of the first report made by the committee of the Fifty-fifth Congress in his favor, to wit, February 17, 1899.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill be amended as follows:

In line 10 strike out all after word "from."

Strike out all of line 11.

In line 12 strike out all up to and including the word "seventy-nine," and insert in lieu of the portions stricken out the words "February 17, 1899."

As thus amended your committee recommend that the bill pass.

Mr. KEAN. I will not ask for the further reading of the report.

Mr. DANIEL. I should like to have the report read through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The entire report will be read.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the report, as follows:

EXHIBIT A.

[Senate Report No. 1684, Fifty-fifth Congress, third session.]

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5069) to amend the act approved March 15, 1878, entitled "An act for the relief of William A. Hammond, late Surgeon-General of the Army," report back the bill with certain amendments and recommend the passage of the same.

It appears that Doctor Hammond was dismissed from the service August 18, 1864, in accordance with the sentence of a general court-martial, which found him guilty of certain offenses alleged to have been committed by him while Surgeon-General of the Army. He subsequently appealed to Congress for relief, and upon this appeal was passed the act approved March 15, 1878, which authorized the President to review the proceedings of the court-martial and to annul and set aside the findings and sentence of the court if, after such review, he should deem it right and proper to do so. The act further authorized the President, in the event that he should annul and set aside the findings and sentence of the court, to place Doctor Hammond on the retired list of the Army as Surgeon-General, provided that the said Hammond should not "in virtue of such restoration to the Army, or of any provision of this act or any other act, be entitled to back, present, or future pay or allowances of any kind whatsoever."

In accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress quoted above, the President, after a review of the proceedings of the court-martial, and upon the recommendation of the Secretary of War, annulled and set aside the findings and sentence in the case of Doctor Hammond and placed him on the retired list of the Army, to date from August 27, 1879.

Since the date last named above Doctor Hammond has been borne on the retired list of the Army, but has received no pay or allowances from the Government. It is the object of the bill now pending for his relief to give him, for the future, the pay of a retired officer of his rank, which is that of a brigadier-general.

The Senate Committee on Military Affairs having under consideration the bill which subsequently became the act of March 15, 1878, under which the President set aside the findings and sentence in the case of Doctor Hammond and placed him upon the retired list, made an exhaustive report (Senate Report No. 102, 45th Cong., 2d sess.), which fully sets forth the history of the case and the grounds upon which the committee recommended the passage of the bill. For present purposes it is believed to be sufficient to make the following quotation from that report:

"Let Doctor Hammond, in event he shall satisfy the President of his right thereto, be restored to his family, his friends, and his profession, freed from every taint or blemish which has hitherto been inflicted upon him under fortuitous circumstances. His brethren in the medical profession honor his name and fame, and his countrymen look upon him with pride as foremost in the ranks of American scientists, humanitarians, and gentlemen. Your committee believes this to be a case wherein the constitutional prerogative of Congress to redress grievances may be safely, justly, and fairly exercised, especially since the President is invested, by the provisions of the bill, with wise discretion. If he find against the merits and equities of the case, then the relief sought must be denied. If he find otherwise, and hence favorably, Doctor Hammond will then receive that reparation to which he is entitled, and which avoids, by the terms of the bill, all reflection and humiliation upon any other party concerned."

Doctor Hammond did satisfy the President that he was entitled to be restored to a status of honor, and he was so restored; but although his name has been borne upon the retired list of the Army for nearly twenty years, and although he has been entitled during all that period to bear the title and wear the uniform of his rank, he could not receive any portion of the retired pay of his grade because of the prohibitory proviso in the act of March 15, 1878. It seems to your committee that if it was just and right that Doctor Hammond should be restored to the Army and placed upon the retired list, it was equally just and right that he should receive the pay allowed by law to other retired officers of his grade. However, the pending bill does not propose and your committee does not recommend that any payment shall be made to him for the many years which have elapsed since he was placed upon the retired list. The bill, if enacted into a law, will simply give him for the future the same right as to pay as is enjoyed by all other officers on the retired list. This is a right which in the natural order of things he can only enjoy for a comparatively few years at most, and it seems to your committee to be one which in fairness and justice should be accorded to him. It is accordingly recommended that the bill as amended be passed.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, all I know about this case is what I have caught in the rapid reading of the bill and report by the clerks at the desk. I do not see that it sets forth any equity at all for the payment of a large sum of money to the estate of a medical officer who was long practically out of the service, and who, while he was in the service in a nominal relation, had a mere complimentary title and rendered no service.

It would seem from the report, if I heard it correctly, that in 1864, while the civil war was going on, Dr. Hammond was court-martialed and dismissed from the service. From that time until the date of his death it does not appear that he rendered a day's service to the Government of the United States. It further appears that subsequently he was restored not only to rank, but to a promoted rank. What his rank was when he was dismissed is not stated, but he was promoted to the rank of a brigadier-general on the retired list upon condition and with the specific provision that he should not have pay.

Mr. President, it is impossible for the Senate to judge, without any report on the subject, as to the matter of the court-martial and dismissal of Doctor Hammond. I know nothing of it and can say nothing about it. The bill, I understand, gives to his widow something over $20,000, a mere gratuity, without service rendered for it, and under circumstances of a very questionable character.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DANIEL. I object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill goes back to the Calendar.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PERKINS. Pursuant to notice, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate the fortifications appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12446) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PERKINS. I will yield to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], to my colleague [Mr. BARD], to the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY], and to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG]. I will then ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the appropriation bill.

Mr. KEAN. Under what rule is this done?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no rule by which yielding can be controlled or governed.

AGREEMENT WITH CHIPPEWA INDIANS.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 196) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Turtle Mountain band of the Chippewa Indians in the State of North Dakota, and to make appropriations for carrying the same into effect.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not wish to object to the bill, if it is a short one and not to be discussed.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I do not understand that it will be discussed. It is very necessary that the bill should be passed as soon as possible.

Mr. FORAKER. If there is anything urgent about it, I shall not object; but I am very anxious that we shall have an executive session to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill called up by the Senator from North Dakota will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. KEAN. I ask the Senator from North Dakota, before the reading is completed, how much money is involved in this measure?

Mr. MCCUMBER. One million dollars.

Mr. KEAN. Then I think the bill had better go over.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I did not hear the Senator from New Jersey.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey objects to the consideration of the bill now.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT LOS ANGELES, CAL.

Mr. BARD. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4453) to amend section 17 of the act of Congress approved June 6, 1902, entitled "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes."

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend section 17 of the act of Congress entitled "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1902, so as to read as follows:

SEC. 17. In the event that said additional land can not be acquired within said sum of $225,000, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and empowered either to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, any additional land in said block which, together with the public-building site belonging to the United States therein, he may deem suitable, sufficient, and necessary for the public building hereinafter authorized to be erected: Provided, That the same can be acquired at a cost of not to exceed $200,000; or, at his discretion, to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a new site in said city of Los Angeles for said public building, and for such purpose, either at his discretion to sell the present public-building site and to apply the net proceeds derived from such sale toward the purchase of said new site in said city of Los Angeles, the limit of cost of which is hereby fixed at $200,000, together with an amount in addition thereto equal to the sum derived from the sale of the present site, or to exchange the present site, or any part thereof, in part or full consideration of and for such new site, and to expend in addition thereto the said sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the purpose.

"That upon the present site, when so enlarged, or upon the new site, when acquired, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to cause to be erected a suitable and commodious fireproof building for the use and accommodation of the United States courts, post-office, and other Government offices in said city of Los Angeles, at a total cost of not to exceed $850,000, inclusive of the cost of additional land or a new site.

"That the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $100,000 contained in section 3 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1899, entitled 'An act to increase the limit of cost for the erection of a public building at Stockton, Cal., and making provision for the acquisition of additional land, or a new site therefor, and to provide for an addition to the public building at Los Angeles, Cal., and appropriating money therefor,' together with the unexpended balance of the appropriation for 'court-house and post-office at Los Angeles, Cal.; for completion of addition to present building under present limit, $150,000,' are hereby covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous items. Authority is hereby given to the Secretary of the Treasury to settle and adjust any claims for damages due to the abrogation of certain contracts under former appropriations for a public building at Los Angeles, provided the amounts thereof can be liquidated for such sums as in his opinion are just and reasonable, and a sum of money sufficient to cover such adjustments and settlements shall be paid from the amount herein authorized. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby further authorized and empowered to enter into contracts for the erection of the building herein authorized within the limit of cost hereby fixed."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. ALLISON. Regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks for the regular order, which is the fortifications appropriation bill.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I hope my friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] will consent to the passage of the bill the consideration of which is desired by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY], and also the bill for which the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG] desires consideration.

The bill we have before us as the regular order is a bill for fortifications and other works of defense. In extending these courtesies to other Senators I know of nothing which will more strengthen their work of fortification and defense with their colleagues than to permit them to have considered and passed the small bills in which they are interested. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I shall not object.

Mr. PERKINS. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that what those Senators are doing for works of defense in their particular localities will not, in my judgment, delay the passage of the appropriation bill. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] desires to speak on the bill, and we all want to hear him, but he talked enough yesterday about it, I think, as did some others. [Laughter.] I hope we shall extend this courtesy to these Senators, if my friend from Iowa will consent.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. CLAY. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that the bill for which I ask consideration will not, I think, consume half a minute.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw my call for the regular order after the statement of the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS].

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ATLANTA, GA.

Mr. CLAY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3180) to provide for the erection of a public building at Atlanta, Ga.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments, on page 1, line 11, before the word "dollars," to strike out "two hundred and fifty thousand;" and on page 2, line 2, before the word "dollars," to strike out "two hundred and fifty thousand;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be erected at Atlanta, Ga., on a site already owned and possessed by the United States, a suitable building for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office, treasury department, and other Government offices in the city of Atlanta, the cost of said building, including necessary and suitable heating and ventilating apparatus, vaults, elevators, and approaches, not to exceed the sum of $1,000,000, which said sum of $1,000,000 is hereby appropriated for said purpose out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Plans, specifications, drawings, and detailed estimates for said building shall be made and approved according to law before work thereon shall be commenced.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CLAY. I move to further amend the bill, on page 1, line 7, after the word "post-office," by striking out the words "treasury department and other Government offices" and inserting in lieu thereof "custom-house and court-house building."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ABSENTEE WYANDOTTE INDIANS.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2268) to authorize the Absentee Wyandotte Indians to select certain lands, and for other purposes. This bill was read the other day, and the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] objected to its further consideration. The objection of the Senator from North Dakota has been withdrawn.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2268) to authorize the Absentee Wyandotte Indians to select certain lands, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been heretofore read, as has been the substitute reported in the nature of an amendment by the Committee on Indian Affairs. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

Mr. LONG. There are two amendments which I desire to offer to the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas will be stated.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Before that is done I will state that this bill does not take any money from the Treasury. It gives to some Indians who, by mistake, lost their right to 80 acres of land each, the opportunity to select other lands off the reservation. There is no scrip about it, and I think there can be no objection to the bill. It has been considered pretty carefully by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment submitted by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee in line 19, on page 2, after the word "person," by striking out "or by his duly authorized attorney in fact;" so as to read:

That each living adult Absentee Wyandotte Indian whose name appears upon a census roll of Absentee Wyandotte Indians made by Special Agent Joel T. Olive, as approved by the Secretary of the Interior December 7, 1896, may select in person, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, from the public domain, 80 acres of agricultural land wherever there may be such lands subject to entry, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LONG. I now move the amendment, which I send to the desk, to come in at the end of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment by adding at the end thereof the following:

And provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may add to the said census roll the names of such persons, not exceeding seventeen in number, as he may find properly to have been entitled to enrollment by said Special Agent Joel T. Olive.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LONG. I ask that there may be printed in the RECORD, without reading, a letter from the Secretary of the Interior and one from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in regard to the second amendment which I have offered to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

The letters referred to are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 25, 1904.

Hon. CHESTER L. LONG, United States Senate.

SIR: I am in receipt of your communication dated February 13, 1904, stating that your attention had been called, since a report made by the Committee on Indian Affairs on S. 2268, being a bill to authorize the Absentee Wyandotte Indians to select certain lands, and for other purposes, that certain exceptions have been taken to the census roll made by Special Agent Joel T. Olive. You ask to be advised whether there is any objection on the part of the Department to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to add such names to the roll as have been omitted. You transmit the proposed amendment as follows:

"And provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may add to the said census roll the names of such persons, not exceeding seventeen in number, as he may find properly to have been entitled to enrollment by said Special Agent Joel T. Olive."

Your letter was referred to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on the 18th instant, and the Department is now in receipt of a report from him, recommending that the amendment be adopted.

I concur in said recommendation and transmit a copy of said report for your information.

Respectfully, E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, February 23, 1904.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

SIR: This office is in receipt of your communication dated February 18, 1904—I. T. D., 1265-1904—in which you inclose for immediate consideration, report, and recommendation a letter dated February 13, 1904, from Hon. CHESTER I. LONG, wherein he requests to be advised whether there would be any objection on the part of the Department to an amendment to S. 2268, "A bill to authorize the Absentee Wyandotte Indians to select certain lands," and authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to add certain names to the census roll made by Special Allotting Agent Joel T. Olive.

The proposed amendment reads as follows: "And provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may add to the said census roll the names of such persons, not exceeding seventeen in number, as he may find properly to have been entitled to enrollment by said Special Agent Joel T. Olive."

Senator LONG has submitted to this office a list of seventeen persons who it is claimed should have been enrolled by Special Agent Olive. If these persons are entitled to enrollment, they should be added to the census roll made by him and approved by the Department. The proposed amendment authorizes the Secretary to add these names to the roll if he shall find them, or any of them, properly entitled to enrollment.

This office believes that the amendment should be adopted, and so recommends.

Very respectfully, A. C. TONNER, Acting Commissioner.

PETER GREEN.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from California yield to me that I may ask the consideration of a brief bill?

Mr. PERKINS. My friend from Wisconsin is so well intrenched and fortified in the hearts and affections of his immediate constituents in Wisconsin, as well as in those of the whole country, that I do not know that it is necessary for him to have this bill passed in order to gain any further favors; and yet, if my friend the chairman of the committee [Mr. ALLISON] does not object, I shall not.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no objection.

Mr. SPOONER. Then, with the permission of the Senator from California, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4849) granting an honorable discharge to Peter Green.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emolument shall accrue by virtue of the passage of this act.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to correct the military record of and grant an honorable discharge to Peter Green, late a member of the Sixth Wisconsin Battery, Light Artillery Volunteers, and now a resident of Harvard, Nebr.: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emolument shall accrue by virtue of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12446) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. DANIEL to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was, on page 3, line 17, after the words "two hundred," to strike out "and fifty;" so that the amendment, if amended, would read:

To enable the Secretary of War in his discretion to purchase for the School of Submarine Defense for experimental work one submarine torpedo boat of the type of the Protector, manufactured by the Lake Torpedo Boat Company, not to exceed, in the judgment and discretion of the Secretary of War, $200,000: Provided, That before said submarine torpedo boat is purchased or accepted by the War Department it shall have been fully tested to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War and shall fulfill all reasonable requirements for coast defense.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should hardly venture to say anything further on this amendment; but after the statement of the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] that argument is perfectly useless and that our votes can not possibly be affected by anything that may be said, I feel stimulated to try. I dare say it is quite true, as the Senator from California says, that it is impossible to produce any effect by discussion; but at the same time I do not wish to be misunderstood, as I think I was somewhat yesterday, as indicated by some of the remarks made by those who are favoring the Lake boat.

I do not think, Mr. President, that anybody questions the importance of submarine boats. That they constitute one of the branches of naval warfare to which the attention of the world is being given is beyond doubt. Everyone is most anxious to get the best submarine boat that is possible.

Nor, Mr. President, do I quite understand the continual allusions to the Holland boat, as if this were a strife between two boats. Personally, I never approved the appropriations for the Holland boat by name. I never had a great deal of faith in the boat, perhaps without knowing much about it. I am certain that it has required many improvements so as to be made at all practicable. I understand that a type of the Holland boat is now in use in England and has been experimented with by our Government, but I never favored naming it in a bill.

I was not aware that the Holland company had anything to do with the question of this boat. I have received no circular, such as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] referred to yesterday, nor have I seen anyone connected with the interests of either boat.

My objection to this proposition, as I tried to say yesterday, proceeds on two grounds: In the first place, the naval appropriation bill opens to this boat and to all boats an opportunity to come in and secure the approbation of the Government. If this boat is what its friends say it is, it can come in under the provision in the naval appropriation bill and be paid for at its entire cost; for the naval provision opens the entire field of submarine boats to competition, the best to be selected.

We have heard from the president of the Lake company and from the other friends of this boat a description of the boat which, if in any reasonable degree true, demonstrates that it is the most remarkable boat ever invented and that it would not have the slightest difficulty in passing a test and showing its superiority to every other known boat. But this boat, with all its merits, seems to fail in one point—it does not seem to be willing to enter a competitive test.

I think the true way in all these matters of patent devices is to open them to competition, the Government, through its experts, to take the best. I know that rule is often violated, but nevertheless I think it is wise policy.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Why does the Senator state that the Lake boat has refused to enter into competition?

Mr. LODGE. Because it can now go into a competition, and if it is the best boat, under the provisions of the naval appropriation bill, it will get the entire $400,000, or whatever it costs. This is a specific appropriation, which shuts out competition.

Mr. WARREN. But, Mr. President, I again appeal to the Senator, and ask why he states that the Lake boat has refused to enter into competition?

Mr. LODGE. Because it comes here for a specific appropriation in a bill which never before, to my knowledge, carried a provision for a boat.

Mr. WARREN. Exactly; yet the other boat came in for a specific appropriation.

Mr. LODGE. It did; and I just said I thought that was a very bad plan.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to say here that upon the only occasion when the owners of this boat had an opportunity to say whether they would enter it in competition they said they would do so.

Mr. LODGE. Then why do they ask this appropriation, naming one boat?

Mr. WARREN. The Secretary of the Navy states that the reason why this boat has not been put in competition was because at first it was not ready, and later on the Holland people refused to enter into the test. It was so stated here in my remarks yesterday, when I read from a hearing before the House Naval Committee the words of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. LODGE. Then this boat is unable to submit to the test of the Navy Department because the Holland people will not submit to a test?

Mr. WARREN. I did not intend to make exactly that statement. I said that the Secretary——

Mr. LODGE. If they alone submit to the test, they will get the money.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator said that they refused to enter into a test, and I challenged that assertion.

Mr. LODGE. I say this amendment is a refusal in itself, because this is a proposition to purchase this specific boat and no other.

Mr. WARREN. It is no refusal on the part of the builders of this boat because the Committee on Appropriations proposed to buy the boat without competition.

Mr. LODGE. Then the builders of the boat did not ask for this amendment?

Mr. WARREN. Nothing was said so far as I know on their part about competition.

Mr. LODGE. I say they did not ask for this amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Certainly. They asked for an appropriation, but made no demand or suggestions concerning competition.

Mr. LODGE. They did ask for it?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. Then this amendment excludes competition.

Mr. WARREN. They did not ask that it should be excluded. Furthermore, the facts hardly warrant the Senator's statement that they refused to enter into a test. This committee thought it was unnecessary that they should at this time compete, and so it suggested a direct appropriation.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. If they do not object to a test, then we can easily adopt the amendment offered, I think, by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], which provides for a test. That can be added to this amendment.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. Can not the Holland boat, this boat, and all other boats go into competition?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; for under a provision in the naval appropriation bill the competition is open to all boats.

Mr. DANIEL. And there is no advantage to the Holland boat over this one in that respect?

Mr. LODGE. There are more devices for submarine boats than these two, and the naval bill opens the competition to all boats, with a provision that the best shall be taken; which, I think, is sound legislation.

Mr. DANIEL. I will state to the Senator that I asked that question because, as I understood, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] said that the Holland boat refused to go into a competition with the Lake boat. If that be so, are they not all required to go into one competition under this act, and is it not equally fair to everybody?

Mr. LODGE. Under the present amendment?

Mr. DANIEL. No; under the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. LODGE. Under the other act, certainly; it is equally fair to everybody.

Mr. President, that is my objection to a specific provision such as that contained in the amendment. I think it is a great deal better in legislation of this kind to open it to general competition, and if this boat is in any degree what it is said to be, it will not only revolutionize submarine warfare, but it need fear no competition.

But I wish to reiterate what I said yesterday and what seems to me a still more serious objection, which is the one reason that has brought me into this debate—I think that it is confusing two services. I do think the fighting ships ought to be kept under the Navy Department. This is a fighting ship. It is not a diving bell, merely for the purpose of laying submarine mines; but it is a fighting ship, and I do not believe it belongs properly under the War Department.

One of the purposes of this boat, which is set forth in the report of the officers, is that it is to be used to cut cables, and its admirable adaptation for that purpose has been dwelt upon here in the discussion. Who cut the cables in the Spanish war? It was work intrusted to the Navy, and necessarily intrusted to the Navy. The men who go to sea must be men who grapple or cut the cables in any way you please, and the work must be intrusted to them to do.

Of course I remember the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] said, "The Army can employ competent seamen to run these boats." It can employ competent seamen to run these boats, beyond a doubt, but that argument proves too much. You might just as well say, "Put all the battle ships and all the cruisers under the War Department, because the War Department can employ competent seamen to run the battle ships." Of course nobody expects that. Senators will remember that at the time of the landing at Santiago, when the transports—merchantmen employed by the War Department—came there, the troops that landed were taken from the ships to the shore by the Navy, and the work was extremely well done.

Mr. President, it seems to me that to create boats of this character and put them under the War Department is to make a confusion of duties which would be of the greatest possible danger in the case of military operations. I have no objection in the world to appropriations for submarine boats; I am in favor of the largest appropriation for everything that makes up our strength in naval warfare; but I do think that everything relating to fighting ships—and this is a boat—ought to be under the Navy.

It is quite true that under the present arrangement officers of the Army are required to place mines in the harbors; but the preparing and sinking of a mine has nothing to do with a boat. This is a boat pure and simple. You have got to have expert engineers, mechanical engineers, on board; you have got to have it in the hands of men accustomed to the sea. No military officer is going to command that boat, except nominally. If we are going to have boats of that character employed in work on which the safety of the nation may depend, I think we want to put them in the hands of the men who have been trained for that specific work. My great objection to this provision is the confusion which will arise between two great Departments which ought never to be confused, and between which all possible friction should be avoided.

Mr. PERKINS. I think, Mr. President, that the Senate understands the question at issue, and I shall not weary it by making any further remarks, except to state that the position taken by my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is hardly the correct one. There can be no conflict between the Army and the Navy in the defense of our harbors and ports. We have a joint board, consisting of the Admiral of the Navy and other officers of the Navy and the Army.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him there, I said nothing about fortifications. This boat is to attack an enemy's fleet, and it is so set forth. That is not fortification work. It is naval warfare.

Mr. PERKINS. The object of this boat, Mr. President, is for coast defense and harbor defense. The joint board of the Army and Navy will meet together and discuss this question, as we have discussed it here to-day. And whatever they decide upon, whether this boat shall be constructed under the auspices and the superintendency of the Navy or the War Department, I have no doubt will be the unanimous decision of both the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War. There can be no conflict. There is but one object in view, and that is to so fortify and defend our harbors as to make them impregnable to the approach of foreign enemies, should they ever arise hereafter to menace the safety of our cities and harbors.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator a question there?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator says this is all a question of coast defense. The Oregon, the Indiana, and the Massachusetts were authorized and are described as coast-defense battle ships. Does the Senator think that is a reason for putting them under the Army?

Mr. PERKINS. There is no analogy whatever——

Mr. LODGE. This is a fighting boat.

Mr. PERKINS. It is a fighting boat for the harbor and for the port to lay submarine mines and torpedoes. That was the principal weapon of defense we had during our late war to guard our ports against an imaginary Spanish fleet which we thought might enter New York Harbor or even Norfolk Harbor of the river James. The Senator went down the river James, and his boat stopped before he reached Norfolk a half dozen times as it approached the submarine batteries and submarine torpedoes that had been placed there by the Engineer Corps of the Army, not of the Navy.

There is no conflict whatever between the Army and Navy upon this question. If there were, I am the last one who would advocate investing the Secretary of War with additional powers over our Navy for any purpose connected with it.

Mr. STEWART. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to ask him a question, which I will precede by a little remark. I am very much in favor of giving our inventions to facilitate our fighting capacity on land and sea a fair trial. I do not think we have been extra liberal to our inventors, and for a good many of our most important things we have to go to foreign countries. I believe in giving our inventors a fair trial, if we do lose a little money by it. But in regard to this amendment, if the provision in the naval appropriation bill covers this exactly, is there not some impropriety in putting this provision in the pending bill? I want to inquire whether this Lake boat would not enter into competition with the other boats, the Holland boat, etc., under the provisions of the naval bill, or has it some peculiar merits that would not be brought out in competition and that it would be desirable to test?

Mr. PERKINS. I think that under the provision in the naval appropriation bill this boat and all other boats will be invited to enter into competition to determine the best submarine boat that can be constructed, and the one that is selected by the Department will undoubtedly be the best.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator a question here? Can the Holland boat, as at present constructed, or invented, while it may serve the purpose of the Navy, compete with the Lake boat, we will say, for the purposes for which the Army needs it in its duty of mining harbors and making harbor defense?

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator's question anticipates what I was about to supplement my remarks by saying that this boat is for a specific purpose of the War Department. It is an experimental test in a measure.

Now, as was stated yesterday again and again, we have passed three different acts whereby we provided an appropriation for the construction of a certain type of Holland torpedo boat. It was named in the appropriation bill. I suggested at the time that it be open to competition. It was said that there were no competitors at that time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from California permit me?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. If it be true that this is the only boat which will accomplish the result that the War Department desires, what is the danger of letting some other boat compete with it?

Mr. PERKINS. I must confess that I am of that opinion in the abstract, and if it was for more than one boat I certainly should echo the sentiments of my friend the Senator from New Hampshire. But we have appropriated one million three hundred and odd thousand dollars for a specific boat. We have eight or nine of those boats already in service.

Now, the parties who have invented the Lake boat come here and say, "We have constructed it; we ask no subsidy; we want no bonus. We are willing now to give you this boat that is completed or to build one that will come up to your requirements, and if it meets your approval you can take it at such a price as we may agree upon."

But the whole gist of this matter is that it is left entirely to the judgment and discretion of the Secretary of War. We all have confidence in him and in the Navy Department and in every other Department, and feel that the Secretary of War will not spend one dollar of this appropriation unless he believes it to be in the interest of the public service and especially in the interest of promoting coast defenses.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Supposing three American inventors had rifles of different construction, and we deliberately put in the army bill a provision that the Secretary of War should examine John Smith's rifle and if was found to be a good one should purchase a thousand of them. Would the Senator think that good legislation?

Mr. PERKINS. We make an appropriation of a hundred thousand dollars a year whereby the Board of Ordnance and Fortification may expermiment and may invite competition——

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. For rifles and for other guns and for carriages and implements of war.

That is the mistake we made in the naval bill. We did not invite competition. The Lake people have spent three times the value of this boat, so they state, in experimenting.

They have asked nothing from the Government, and now if they come to the Government with a boat that meets the requirements—and I am sure the Secretary of War will not decide the matter without consulting with the joint board of the Navy and the War Department—and if they decide that it is advisable and expedient to purchase this boat, can we not leave the responsibility for doing it with the War Department?

Mr. STEWART. I should like to ask the Senator from California a question.

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. Is it necessary for the Secretary of War or the War Department to have a boat for the purpose of planting mines, cutting cables, and doing the like of that in a harbor, independent of the general use that is made of such boats by the Navy? Must the War Department have this boat for the special purpose of the duties which are devolved upon the Secretary of War? Is it necessary for him to have a boat of this kind under his control instead of under the control of the Navy?

Mr. PERKINS. The commanding-general of our armies says it is and recommends it.

Mr. STEWART. Under his control?

Mr. PERKINS. He so recommends it, and I defer to him and to his judgment.

Mr. GALLINGER obtained the floor.

Mr. PROCTOR. In answer to the Senator from Nevada, I will state that the mines and all the electrical apparatus and the wires in connection with the bombproof in the fort are under the control of the Secretary of War. The War Department officials must have some means for examining them.

Mr. STEWART. Is it necessary, for the proper discharge of those duties, that the Secretary of War shall have this boat?

Mr. PROCTOR. There must be means of examining them, of taking them up and replacing them.

Mr. STEWART. It has to be under his control?

Mr. PROCTOR. Of course it is necessary to be under the control of the Department which controls the mines.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I thought perhaps I might answer the question which the Senator from Nevada asked—that is, whether, under the provision in the naval appropriation bill, if this boat shall be decided to be the best boat, that is not all that is necessary. But the War Department could get no boat if it were found——

Mr. PERKINS. I so stated.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. In that competition that the Lake boat is the very best boat. That is for the Navy. This boat is asked for by General Chaffee, and is recommended by the board of army officers for use in connection with harbor defense and fortifications. It possesses qualifications for that work which certainly no other boat possesses at the present time.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask the Senator a question on that point. Does he not think that a boat of this kind, whatever service it is put to, ought to have the approbation of naval experts, or does he think that army officers are as good judges of boats as naval officers?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I can not answer that question without going into the matter further than I would be justified in doing while trespassing upon the time of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. LODGE. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not know the Senator from New Hampshire had the floor.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not think there is anything to the argument which the Senator from Massachusetts made here this morning as to the confusion which is to result between the Army and the Navy if this amendment should pass, and I think I can demonstrate it when I get the opportunity in my own right.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am not going to prolong this discussion very much. I wish first to call attention to what was said this morning to the effect that the Holland boat people had declined the competition with the Lake boat people. If Senators will refer to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this morning, pages 3223 and 3224, they will find a letter dated Newport, R. I., January 11, 1904. From that letter they will observe that the Lake boat people admitted that their boat possessed a great many defects; and that was two months and three or four days ago.

Mr. LODGE. What page?

Mr. GALLINGER. Pages 3223 and 3224. They admitted that the screws did not work well; that the boat was not making the speed that they expected—in one instance only 3 knots an hour in place of 10; that the battery was wrong; that the shafts were wrong; that the steering gear was not working satisfactorily, etc. And after making these admissions what do they say? This is their modest request:

> Should the board after the examination of the boat find her suitable for naval service, and so recommend, we, contingent upon that encouragement, will make all of these improvements at our expense before turning the vessel over to the Government.

There is not a word about competition.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. They offered to go in as they were.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is not a word about competition. And when the Acting Secretary of the Navy replied to that letter, what did he say?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What page?

Mr. GALLINGER. On the same pages. He replied eight days afterwards in these words:

> It is desired, therefore, that before you apply for a competitive trial of your boat you will furnish the Department with a formal statement in writing to the following effect, viz: "That the boat which you submit to the Department for test is at that time finally completed and that you are prepared to accept as final, for the purposes of this act, the results of which your boat is capable of developing on trial at the present time."
> It is important that this should be clearly understood, as, in view of the competitive character of these trials, the Department can not allow them to be repeated, but will insist that the results of these trials when once held must be considered as final in the matter of determining the relative merits, under the act of Congress aforesaid, of the various competing boats.

That was written a month and half ago by the Acting Secretary of the Navy to the Lake company, showing that in the judgment of the Navy Department the Lake boat was not prepared at that time to enter into a competitive test.

Mr. President, in the very delightful discussion we had yesterday on the amendment of the committee there was a wide difference of opinion on many points, and there were some conflicting statements, one of which I wish to try to clear up. There were some severe criticisms passed upon the Holland Boat Company. Perhaps the severest criticism passed upon that company was in a letter that was read from the Lake company. I think it was not good taste in that company to animadvert as it did upon its competitor. Severe criticisms were likewise made by Senators regarding the Holland company, one of the points being that the Government put itself back of that company when the boat was simply on paper, and that it is refreshing, as the Senator from California said with so much unction, to find a company which spends its own money to complete a boat, as the Lake company has done.

Mr. President, let us see what the facts are. I think I can dissipate this fairy tale about the Holland company having received any special gratuities from the Government of the United States. The Holland Boat Company spent a great deal of money, in my judgment hundreds of thousands of dollars, upon experiments. They had a boat, not completed, but in process of completion. They came to the Government of the United States and said they would like the Government to advance some money on that uncompleted boat, promising to do their best to put it in such shape that the Government might buy it, and placing themselves under obligation to refund the money that the Government advanced in the event the boat became a failure.

The Government did advance $90,000. The Holland people proceeded to construct their boat. The Government interfered with their construction. The Government insisted that a steam boiler should be put in the boat in place of a gasoline engine. The company knew that the boat could not be navigated with a steam boiler, but they were compelled to do what the Navy Department required them to do, and they did it; and when the boat came to trial it was a complete failure, an absolute and utter failure.

Now, what did that company do? I am not guessing about this matter. I went to the Navy Department for my information, and I find that under date of November 23, 1900, the late Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Long, addressed the following communication to the Holland Torpedo Boat Company:

> GENTLEMEN: Inclosed herewith is one of the triplicates of the contract, duly executed on the part of the United States, entered into by you with this Department for the construction of one submarine torpedo boat, together with one of the triplicates of the bond and of the specifications accompanying said contract.
> Receipt is acknowledged of your order of the 19th instant on Messrs. August Belmont & Co. to pay to the Department the sum of $90,000 deposited with them in accordance with the agreement of April 11, 1900, which order is accepted by Messrs. Belmont & Co. and payment promised on proper indorsement thereon by the Department. The necessary action will be taken without delay for the transfer of said sum to the Government.

Mr. President, this was a voluntary act on the part of the Holland company. It is true they were held for the payment of this money, according to the contract they had made with the Government; but it was a very honorable thing for them to step up with a certified check on August Belmont & Co. and hand it over to the Government to wipe out the obligation that the Government had incurred in the construction of a boat which the Government itself, by its interference, had made a failure.

I am not permitted to quote names in this connection, but I will say to Senators that if they will go to the Navy Department they will find there authority for the statement that never in the history of the Government, in matters of this kind, has so honorable and high-minded an act been done by a company that was endeavoring to serve the Government in the matter of a very valuable invention.

Mr. President, what did the company next do? They wiped out the obligation to the Government by the check on August Belmont & Co., which is ordinarily good in this country. They had made a failure of their boat. The boat which had failed was called the Plunger. Out of their own funds they proceeded to build the original Holland boat bearing the name of Holland, and when that boat became a success, as it did become a success, they offered it to the Government of the United States, and the Government purchased it. That is the entire story.

Mr. President, I submit that the company ought not to be held up here as a company which has received the benefactions of the Government and for that reason is estopped, as the Senators suggested it ought to be estopped, from making a protest against the action proposed in this bill. This company had a right to come here. They discovered in the bill, when it was reported to this body, or their friends or representatives did, that this provision excluding them from competition was in the bill.

They had a right to come here, as they did come here, and protest against it. They would have been false, Mr. President, to the interests of the stockholders of the company, whoever they may be, had they not done that, and instead of being criticised it seems to me they ought to be commended. Not only did the company pay back the $90,000 which they got from the Government, but they paid all the incidental expenses, such as advertising, etc., amounting, as I understand, to two or three thousand dollars, which they were not obligated to do under their contract.

Mr. President, all I ask in this matter is that these different companies and the Government itself, which is building boats of this type, shall be given a fair chance to demonstrate which is the better type of boat. I am opposed, as the Senator from Massachusetts is opposed (and he has stated it much better than I can), to dividing our Navy and putting part of it under the Navy Department and part under the War Department. I think it is a mischievous thing to do and that it will inevitably result in confusion and in conflict of authority.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Is this, strictly speaking, a naval vessel?

Mr. GALLINGER. We have always so treated them.

Mr. SPOONER. Is it not a vessel adapted peculiarly to harbor defense?

Mr. GALLINGER. Just as the Holland boats are.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not care anything about the Holland boats.

Mr. GALLINGER. No.

Mr. SPOONER. It is distinguished from this boat.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not distinguished from this boat at all.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not speaking with reference to any contest between the boats. I do not want to get into that controversy.

Mr. GALLINGER. No.

Mr. SPOONER. But are not both this boat and the Holland boat peculiarly adapted to harbor defense?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. SPOONER. Is that within the jurisdiction of the Navy Department or the War Department?

Mr. GALLINGER. I should believe it to be within the jurisdiction of the Navy Department. If it is not, let the War Department take over the whole thing.

Mr. SPOONER. I am asking for the fact.

Mr. GALLINGER. The fact is that the Navy Department has always had control of them until this moment.

Mr. SPOONER. Of harbor defense?

Mr. GALLINGER. Of these boats.

Mr. SPOONER. I am talking about harbor defense.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes, in a sense. I take it if a man-of-war is in a harbor, it will protect the harbor to the best of its ability.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly. But, referring to the mining of a harbor, is that done under the Navy Department?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is under the War Department.

Mr. SPOONER. Is it under the Navy Department or the War Department—which?

Mr. GALLINGER. Under the War Department. But we never heretofore had any trouble about laying down or taking up mines. We have not required this particular type of boat to do it. We have done it without any difficulty.

Mr. SPOONER. Is the School of Submarine Defenses under the Navy Department or the War Department?

Mr. GALLINGER. Under the War Department.

Mr. SPOONER. Why, then, is there a conflict between the War Department and the Navy Department as to harbor defenses?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not understand that there has been any conflict; but I think there will be in the near future if we put this provision in this bill and it becomes a law.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, this boat is for far more than harbor defense. It is a seagoing vessel, and is to go and attack ships. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] says it is to go from New York to London. It is to be used to attack the enemy's fleet. It is not to be used simply to place mines. It is to be used for strictly naval purposes—for scouting, for picketing, for going out and attacking the enemy's fleet when it approaches, and, as I say, the Senator from Missouri expects to have it go from New York to London. If that does not constitute a seagoing vessel I do not know what does.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Massachusetts need not spend any time in indulging in elaborate argument to establish the fact that a vessel which can go from London to New York is a seagoing vessel.

Mr. LODGE. That is the point I wanted to make. It is something far more than for submarine defense. But submarine boats have always been under the Navy Department. That is the fact.

Mr. SPOONER. I am asking for information.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Wisconsin asked a very pertinent question. I answered it, perhaps not quite as fully as I should have done, when I said that these boats are for harbor defense. Of course they are for more than that. They go out and attack an enemy's ships. If a hostile fleet were lying 5 or 6 miles outside of New York City, threatening to bombard the city, we would expect these boats to go out and attack them.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I do not mean this boat or the Holland boat, but take submarine boats generally. Why should not some of them be in charge of the Navy and some in charge of the Army or the War Department; that is to say, why should not there be such boats under the control of the War Department, so far as its duty relates to harbor defense, which is under the control of the War Department?

Mr. GALLINGER. We have always heretofore differentiated on that matter. We are establishing a naval station in Cuba. It is a naval station, but the Army will have charge of the defenses. I do not suppose we will establish a battery there and put it under the Navy Department. We have always clearly distinguished between the duties of the War Department and the duties of the Navy Department. The Navy Department heretofore has had charge of all the boats of this class. Now, if it is a desirable thing to put these boats into the hands of the War Department, let us make a clean sweep of it.

Mr. SPOONER. Why? Does it follow, if I do not bother the Senator——

Mr. GALLINGER. You do not bother me at all.

Mr. SPOONER. Does it follow because such a boat is a valuable adjunct to harbor defense, which is within the jurisdiction of the War Department and properly ought to be, that all these boats should be within the jurisdiction of the War Department?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is very clear to me.

Mr. SPOONER. Is it not perfectly reasonable that some of these boats should be within the control of the War Department, so far as their functions will relate to harbor defense, and all the rest of them be within the control of the Navy Department?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think we might upon the same hypothesis place a war ship in each great American port for the purpose of harbor defense, putting it under the War Department.

Mr. SPOONER. The war ship is not intended for that use in the sense that these boats will be.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, pretty near. These boats, as the Senator from Massachusetts shows and as is a fact, are not for harbor defense alone. I do not think the Japanese nation has any submarines, although the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] told us that a Japanese who was once a cook on a boat of the Lake type is running the submarines in the Japanese navy, and that he destroyed the Russian navy. But they have boats—torpedo boats—that go out and attack the enemy's fleet; go away from their harbors, from the coast, just as we expect these boats to do, and the Lake people claim their boat is a seagoing vessel.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] painted a beautiful picture yesterday, saying that we could spend a million dollars and build a Lake boat that could traverse the sea and destroy pretty nearly all the navies of the world. I understand that such a boat could not be sunk with safety, and hence could not do the work of a submarine vessel.

Mr. SPOONER. Is it not still open to doubt how efficient and successful these submarine boats will be as mere naval boats? Is it open to doubt that they will be of great utility inside of the harbor as a part of the harbor defense? In other words, is not their efficiency to that extent established, whereas their efficiency and possibilities as to use as naval vessels proper remain yet to be determined?

Mr. GALLINGER. I would say to the Senator that I have seen a submarine torpedo boat traverse the water quite a considerable distance, and I will not venture to say how far, but perhaps half a mile——

Mr. SPOONER. They would have to do that to be of any use in harbor defense.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course.

Mr. GALLINGER. If she can do that, then she could go a much longer distance, as for instance the Holland boats that were caught in the gale and thrown on the rocks, and the Lake boat people cite that to prove they are of no account. They did very recently go a good many hundred miles through the open sea, and with comparative safety.

Now, as I say, I have seen them traverse the water a very considerable distance, come to the surface, fire their torpedo with absolute accuracy, and that is what they are expected to do—to attack the enemy's fleet in the open. I do not see what else they can do. The enemy's fleet is not coming in near proximity to the coast——

Mr. SPOONER. They might get behind a submarine mine and be of utility, and the war ship would not be able to do that without danger of destruction.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, I do not know——

Mr. SPOONER. I have not heard the debate. I do not profess to know. I am asking merely for information. I do not think that there can be any contest over this matter between the two Departments or between the Holland Boat Company and the Lake Boat Company. It looks to me like a question——

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SPOONER. When I finish my sentence. It seems to me, a mere onlooker, so to speak, that the real question is whether this boat is an efficient boat, whether it has been demonstrated to be an efficient boat for harbor defense, and whether the War Department, which is charged with harbor defense, asks for this boat.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that the War Department does not ask for it and has not asked for it; and I will go further than that and say to the Senator from Wisconsin that we have appropriated $850,000 in the naval bill to test all these boats.

Mr. SPOONER. That is to develop the capacity of these boats with reference to their utility as naval boats.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no.

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. GALLINGER. It covers it all. I will read to the Senator precisely what it does. It provides that the Secretary of the Navy—> may purchase or contract for subsurface or submarine torpedo boats in a manner that will best advance the interests of the United States in torpedo or submarine warfare.

That is the provision in the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. LODGE. It covers everything.

Mr. GALLINGER. Could the Senator modify that and make it any more specific?

Mr. SPOONER. You have two jurisdictions as to coast defenses. You have, of course, the artillery——

Mr. WARREN. We have a joint board of the Army and Navy to consider exactly such questions and problems as those propounded in this debate. I do not believe it will be contended by the Navy side that you could have a joint board of the Army and Navy of which the Army was not an equal part and did not have an equal say. Now, the Army, through the duly constituted authorities, have asked for this boat for its (the Army's) purposes.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the Senator is unfortunate in his illustration, inasmuch as the provision of this bill puts it in the hands of the Secretary of War.

Mr. WARREN. Very true.

Mr. GALLINGER. It does not propose that this joint board shall be consulted at all.

Mr. WARREN. Very true; but when it comes to the use of it and to any clash of authorities, if such there should be, and which I believe there will not be, then all such matters will go before the joint board just the same as in the case of the other boats that are ordered or built by the Navy, but used for army purposes.

This boat proposes to do certain work necessary in the coast defenses for the Army which the regular submarine torpedo boats do not propose to do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator tell me, then, why he objects to competition? If this boat is the only boat that can do that, it excludes the others.

Mr. WARREN. Very well. I am not objecting to the boat being selected without competition. It is the Senator who objects to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg the Senator's pardon. I have contended all along for competition, as is proposed in the naval bill. I also propose to offer an amendment to this bill providing for competition, but the friends of this amendment say they will not accept my proposition. Now I will read what the proposed provision is. I have changed it so as to apply it to the War Department.

Mr. WARREN. But, Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. Allow me to read this.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will yield for just a moment.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator says I object to competition. This is the amendment I shall offer as a substitute for the pending provision when it gets into the Senate, if it does get into the Senate, which I hope it will not do:

> The Secretary of War is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to contract for or purchase for the School of Submarine Defense, for experimental purposes, one submarine torpedo boat at a cost not exceeding $ 50,000—

I have changed the provision in the naval appropriation bill in that respect—

> Provided, That prior to said purchase or contract for said boat any American inventor or owner of a submarine torpedo boat may give reasonable notice and have his, her, or its submarine torpedo boat tested by comparison or competition, or both, with a Government submarine torpedo boat or any private competitor, provided there be any such, and thereupon the board appointed for conducting such tests shall report the result of said competition or comparison, together with its recommendations, to the Secretary of War, who may purchase or contract for a submarine torpedo boat in a manner that will best advance the interests of the United States in torpedo or submarine warfare and coast defense.

Mr. WARREN. That does not reach the question. That is a mere matter of competition with torpedo boats for submarine warfare, and this boat is being purchased because it is a great deal more than a torpedo boat.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well; then the boat you advocate will have the field to itself.

Mr. WARREN. We leave it entirely in the discretion of the Secretary of War as to whether he shall buy it or not, and how much he will pay, not exceeding $250,000.

Mr. LODGE. If there is no other boat, may I ask the Senator what objection is there to competition?

Mr. WARREN. What reason is there for it? We have voted year after year to buy Holland torpedo boats by name.

Mr. GALLINGER. We did when there was no other boat on the market.

Mr. WARREN. Then you suddenly change, after that concern has sold a large number of boats, and check off some new inventor who wishes some recognition by the Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am astounded that the Senator from Wyoming should adopt that line of argument. One year ago, which was the first time in the history of this country when there was a competing submarine torpedo boat invented, the Lake Torpedo Boat Company came to the Committee on Naval Affairs and drafted an amendment, submitted it to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and we put it in the bill; and we repeated it in the bill this year. Now, after having done that, we meeting them with open hands and giving them precisely what they asked for, why is it that they come here now and say that they do not want competition—that the Government ought to buy one of their boats by name?

Mr. LODGE. Because it is beyond competition.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Because there is no boat like theirs, and therefore there can be no competition with a competitor that has a boat like theirs or adapted to do that work.

Mr. GALLINGER. If that is true, then they have the field to themselves. But I want to deny that there is no boat that will compete with them. They will have competition if we open this to competition.

Mr. President, I said in the beginning that I did not propose to delay the consideration of this matter, and I will content myself with the simple added statement that all I am contending for here is fair play between these several boats and fair play so far as the Government itself is concerned, because the Government is building some boats of a submarine type, and with the further statement that I feel it is a very dangerous precedent to establish, when the Navy Department and the Committee on Naval Affairs have been dealing with this question from the time the first submarine boat was presented for consideration to the present time, to now proceed upon an army bill to provide for the construction and purchase of a naval vessel, because it is nothing but a naval vessel.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It is for coast defense.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is of course for coast defense, precisely as other submarine boats and torpedo boats are for coast defense. Every torpedo flotilla is for coast defense primarily. But we were considerably frightened not a great many months ago when it was suggested that some torpedo boats from a far-off nation threatened to appear on our American coast. They are primarily for coast defense, but they have gone beyond that. They are designed to attack an enemy's fleet.

So far as the laying of mines and cutting of mines are concerned, the Senator from California has painted a picture of the dangers there were here a few years ago in the Potomac River. We had no trouble about laying those mines or cutting them.

We do not expect to go out into the harbors of foreign countries and either lay or cut mines with these boats. If they are of any use in the matter of mining or countermining, laying or removing mines, it is to be on our own coast, and we have abundant facilities for doing that now. There is not an American inventor who can not produce something for $50,000 that will do that kind of work just as well as this $250,000 boat can do it. Senators know what the present method is, and that it is an inexpensive method. The idea that we are going to purchase a quarter of a million dollar boat because the inventor has represented that he can lay mines or can countermine or remove mines is absolutely without any force.

Now, Mr. President, that is all I care to say. If the Senate, in its wisdom, sees fit to depart from its established rule in this matter, if it sees fit to refuse competition when these gentlemen themselves insisted upon competition and got it, of course I am estopped from doing anything further than what I now do, and that is to enter a protest against what I can conceive to be bad legislation.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in regard to the point on which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] was speaking, we have built four turret harbor-defense monitors. They are vessels which can not fight in a seaway. They get from place to place only with the utmost difficulty and with considerable danger. They are exactly what they are described, harbor-defense vessels. They are practically floating turrets.

We used the old monitors in the Spanish-American war in that way at many of our Atlantic ports. They were used as strictly for harbor defense as anything could be, and yet they have been kept, and very properly, under the command of the Navy.

It seems to me in regard to this boat that the least of her many good qualities is the quality of laying mines.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator state where those monitors are at present?

Mr. LODGE. They are under construction and——

Mr. WARREN. All of them?

Mr. LODGE. No; there are three of them attached to the coast squadron, one to the Pacific Squadron. They are not cruising vessels. They are not cruisers, I can say to the Senator.

Mr. PERKINS. One went to Manila.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will admit that they are to-day in foreign waters.

Mr. LODGE. One of them is, undoubtedly.

Mr. WARREN. Another is at Panama.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; undoubtedly. They are not cruising vessels, and they can not fight in a seaway.

Mr. WARREN. They are used entirely upon the surface, and they are an entirely different vessel.

Mr. LODGE. Undoubtedly they are used on the surface. Whether a boat is used on the surface or as a submarine craft does not alter the fact that it is a boat.

Mr. WARREN. So is a revenue cutter a war boat, carrying fixed and movable guns, but it is not a part of the Navy of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. But this is a boat filled with machinery which requires a mechanical engineer, for which work the Navy is trained.

Now, Mr. President, I do not want to go over all that again, but I think to have a general on land ordering a fleet attack with its one set of submarines and an admiral at sea ordering another fleet attack with another set of submarines might lead to confusion when it is the same fleet that is attacked.

It seems to me that there is no reason why this boat should not enter the naval competition. For some reason it is not desired to bring it before the naval board. Therefore it is put into the army bill to bring it before an army board. But when we ask for a clause providing for competition we are told that this boat has not a competitor in the world, and that that is the reason why it should not be open to competition; that it is beyond and above competition, and therefore that is a reason for not allowing anybody else to compete. If this boat is so enormously superior to every other boat, and I do not deny it, I do not pretend to know, it should not dread competition. I have not seen it operate even on a committee table, and I do not know that it is not the finest boat in the world. I hope it is. But if it is all it is said to be, why, I ask, should it dread competition?

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong this debate, and I will say only a word or two in justification of the reasons which impelled the Committee on Appropriations to insert this particular amendment in the bill.

In the early consideration of this question in the committee I shared very much the view just now expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts that matters respecting torpedo boats and other boats for defensive or aggressive warfare properly belong to the Navy; but after reading the testimony in another place submitted during the consideration of the naval appropriation bill, I became impressed with the great value of this boat. Then it was urged upon the committee first by a commission appointed by the Secretary of War, who had made preliminary tests as respects the characteristics of this boat and made a report to the General of the Army, who warmly and heartily recommended it as an important adjunct to the coast defenses. That seemed to me to be a matter perfectly in line with the duties of the War Department, because they do have charge of the coast defenses, whatever those defenses may be, whether the laying of mines, the erection of fortifications, the emplacement of guns, or what not.

This Mr. Lake, I will say, appeared before us, and after hearing him I became convinced that there was great value in this invention of his. He stated to us that he had been engaged in the various valuable inventions connected with this boat for a great many years, and that he had expended $400,000 or $500,000 in perfecting his inventions. It seemed to me that it would be a most valuable adjunct to our coast defenses, and I can not but believe that it is true now, after hearing many of the arguments pro and con, as I have been able to hear them on the floor of the Senate.

But there is another point that has affected my judgment somewhat, perhaps largely. I am not certain whether this boat will have the kind of test it ought to have under the provision placed in the naval appropriation bill. There is ample provision, I agree, for submarine boats in the naval appropriation bill. The Senate in considering the bill made some amendments respecting the method of dealing with the subject.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator a question? He says he does not think the test provided in the naval appropriation bill is satisfactory——

Mr. ALLISON. No; I did not say that.

Mr. LODGE. That it would not be fair to this boat?

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir; I certainly did not say that.

Mr. LODGE. I beg the Senator's pardon; I thought he criticised the test provided in the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. ALLISON. No; I do not criticise it. On the contrary, I regard it as a most valuable provision; but whether there can be made under it a test that can deal with all the things that this boat is supposed to be adapted to, I do not know.

Mr. LODGE. That is just what I wanted to ask the Senator. He does not think the test under the naval appropriation bill is sufficiently thorough; he believes that it will be a test of only a part of it?

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me, I will endeavor to present the whole of my statement, and then I shall be very glad to hear his suggestion. Here is a test provided in the naval appropriation bill, which, by the way, has not yet passed; it is in limbo between the two Houses.

Mr. LODGE. Both Houses have agreed to the essential part of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know whether they have or not.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator will observe that it is a House provision.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, I so observe. I certainly can observe what is right before me——

Mr. GALLINGER. But——

Mr. ALLISON. And I shall read that amendment if I have an opportunity. I hope the Senator will allow me just long enough to do that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa declines to yield further.

Mr. ALLISON. No; certainly not. I will yield to the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The bill (S. 1508) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection thereon of a public building to be used for a Department of State, a Department of Justice, and a Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the fortification bill. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not decline to yield to the Senator from New Hampshire, but I shall endeavor to——

Mr. GALLINGER. I tried to yield to all comers.

Mr. ALLISON. I yield to the Senator with pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will not interrupt the Senator if it is disagreeable.

Mr. ALLISON. It is not disagreeable.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to say that the Senator possibly overlooked this House provision, in which the Senate concurred, and the conference committee could not do anything with it if it tried.

Mr. ALLISON. If that be true, then of course my suggestion wholly falls. Now, let us see if that is true.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is the addition of two words.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. Here is the provision. I will read the whole of it, as I have not occupied much time on this subject.

Provided, That prior to said purchase—

That is, the purchase of subsurface or submarine torpedo boats—

Provided, That prior to said purchase or contract for said boats any American inventor or owner of a subsurface or submarine torpedo boat may give reasonable notice and have his, her, or its subsurface or submarine torpedo boat tested by comparison or competition, or both—

This is a very wide provision, and a very valuable one, I think—with a Government subsurface or submarine torpedo boat or any private competitor, provided there be any such, and thereupon the board appointed for conducting such tests shall report the result of said competition or comparisons, together with its recommendations, to the Secretary of the Navy, who may purchase or contract for subsurface or submarine torpedo boats in a manner that will best advance the interests of the United States in submarine warfare.

That was the original text.

Mr. GALLINGER. "Or coast defense."

Mr. ALLISON. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. That is the point I am coming to. That is the very kernel in this nut that has troubled me. The words "torpedo or" were inserted.

And provided further—

Then there is struck out the provision in the text which reads:

That before any subsurface or submarine torpedo boat is purchased or contracted for it shall be accepted by the Navy Department as fulfilling all reasonable requirements for submarine warfare and shall have been fully tested to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy.

Those words are stricken out in the navy appropriation bill, and there are inserted other words which the Senator must have overlooked when he stated that the text was not materially interfered with.

That before any subsurface or submarine torpedo boat—

I am reading now the amendment—or boats are purchased or accepted by the Navy Department they shall have been fully tested to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy and shall fulfill all reasonable requirements for torpedo or submarine warfare.

That is practically a repetition.

Provided also, That the boats contracted for under this act shall be constructed in accordance with the plans and specifications of the contractor.

The criticism I make and which influenced my mind as respects this provision is that the tests provided for in the provision of the naval appropriation act are tests for naval warfare, and therefore it may be that there are things connected with this invention which are most valuable and important, as I believe they are, for coast defense that will not stand the test for simple naval warfare. If the words the Senator inserted in his quotation were here "naval warfare or coast defense," I should think there was ample opportunity under this provision in the naval appropriation bill, but I must submit to my friend, after having made my explanation, he himself having supposed that those words were here, whether he thinks now that there is not a possible difficulty in making a test or competition under the appropriation of $850,000 in the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am free to admit I was mistaken as to the words being in the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. They are most essential words.

Mr. GALLINGER. May I call the Senator's attention to the language of my proposed amendment? Perhaps he was not in when I read the amendment. I shall propose putting it in the hands of the Secretary of War to "purchase or contract for a submarine torpedo boat in a manner that will best advance the interests of the United States in torpedo or submarine warfare and coast defense." Will the Senator object to that provision?

Mr. LODGE. That involves competition, of course.

Mr. GALLINGER. It involves competition.

Mr. ALLISON. I had not reached that phase of my suggestion as yet. I became satisfied, as I said, that here was a valuable invention, both for coast-defense purposes and for naval warfare. The inventor had expended a large sum of money, and was willing to submit to any test his boat might be subjected to, and to submit himself thoroughly to the discretion of the Secretary of War, who certainly will not exercise that discretion until he finds something useful and important in this invention. It seemed to me, therefore, when we had appropriated $850,000 in the naval appropriation bill for torpedo boats, the provision being thus circumscribed and limited, that it was a wise thing for us to give this boat an opportunity of being tested in the discretion of the Secretary of War; and if it shall meet the requirements which its inventor claims it will meet, then I submit, Mr. President, there is no more important duty which can be performed by the two Houses than to expend $250,000 for this experimental craft.

Mr. SPOONER. Is it seagoing?

Mr. ALLISON. Whether it is absolutely a seagoing vessel or not I do not know, although it was claimed for it that it could sail 500 miles out in the ocean. But it seemed to me that here was a valuable invention which ought to be tested, and if the Secretary of War finds after a test that it is most valuable, as the army board and as General Chaffee have already found it to be, then I think it is a most useful appropriation, especially so when we compare the amount involved with the work this little craft can do if it comes up to what is claimed for it. It could destroy the great battle ships of other nations or it could destroy one of our own should it approach the harbor of New York or any other harbor.

We have appropriated in the naval appropriation bill $31,000,000 for the construction of battle ships, chiefly for armored cruisers, and yet this inventor might carry his invention across the sea. He might give it to the Japanese, who were instructed, it seems, on board this vessel by Mr. Lake by disguising themselves as cooks. If a foreign government should have the benefit of this American invention, and if we were to undertake to enter a foreign harbor with one of our battle ships, it could be destroyed in fifteen or twenty minutes by this little craft. Then we would regret many days and many times that we had not ourselves encouraged this inventor in the perfection of this little machine for which there is so much claimed.

I knew nothing about this matter until it was presented to the Committee on Appropriations. My judgment was against it, as I said in the beginning, and I believed it was not in order on this bill. That was my early judgment; but when I came to examine the bill more carefully, it being a fortifications appropriation bill and there being provisions in it without number for mines and electrical apparatus on fortifications and connecting them with the ground and beneath the water, I made up my mind that it is just as essential a part of our coast defenses as is a grappling hook to take up one of the mines. Therefore I believed that the amendment would be as much in order as a part of this fortifications bill as it would be in order in this bill to make provision for building guns upon emplacements in our fortifications in one of our harbors.

So, Mr. President, the Committee on Appropriations believed, first, that they were making a recommendation to the Senate that was in order on the fortifications appropriation bill in providing for our coast defenses. They believed that it is as much a part of the machinery of our coast defenses as are the guns that are in barbette or concealed; that it is as much a part of the machinery of our coast defenses as are the mines that we sink under the water in our harbors.

Mr. President, I only desired to say that my mind is made up as respects these two points. I will say, further, I have no doubt that the Secretary of the Navy will, in the execution of this appropriation of $850,000, test this boat among others as to its seafaring qualities and as to its value for naval warfare as distinguished from coast-defense warfare.

Mr. President, in view of the enormous appropriations we are making year by year for the upbuilding of our Navy (and I have supported them all without criticism and without objection), in view of the enormous appropriations we are making here for the defense of our harbors, amounting to more than $100,000,000 within the last eight or ten years, when we see a proposition here that will eliminate many of the elements of this great cost in our harbor defenses and, it may be, upon the ocean, we should favor it. We should test every invention that is recommended to us as valuable by the high officers of our Government who are familiar with warfare, whether they are officers of the Army or officers of the Navy.

I did not intend to participate in this debate, and I would not have done so except that at the last moment I saw the criticisms were rather severe upon the Appropriations Committee for undertaking to mingle the Navy and the Army in a fortifications bill. There is no such purpose. There is no such mingling. There will be no difficulty whatever in regard to it. If the army and navy officers are patriotic, as I suppose them to be, and there is an engine of destruction such as this engine is believed to be by me, there will be no controversy between the General of the Army and the Admiral of the Navy as to who shall command this great craft, whether it be in the harbor of New York or upon the ocean in the vicinity of New York.

Mr. ALGER. Mr. President, having had some experience during the Spanish-American war, I wish to testify to the need of the War Department for a ship or a boat to plant mines, to remove them, and to put out the electrical apparatus. Whether this is a good ship for the Navy is a question; but if it is as described, it is absolutely needed by the War Department, and I trust it will be given to the War Department, to aid in its coast defense and in the planting of its mines. If the Navy needs such a ship, let them build another.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], who is absent, is very much interested in this amendment, and therefore I think action upon it had better be deferred for the present.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest the want of a quorum, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Alger,	Dolliver,	Long,	Platt, N. Y.
Allison,	Fairbanks,	McCreary,	Proctor,
Bacon,	Foraker,	McEnery,	Quarles,
Beveridge,	Foster, La.	Mallory,	Quay,
Blackburn,	Frye,	Martin,	Scott,
Burrows,	Fulton,	Millard,	Spooner,
Clark, Mont.	Gallinger,	Money,	Stewart,
Clark, Wyo.	Gibson,	Newlands,	Stone,
Clarke, Ark.	Heyburn,	Patterson,	Teller,
Clay,	Hoar,	Penrose,	Warren,
Cullom,	Kean,	Perkins,	Wetmore.
Daniel,	Latimer,	Pettus,
Dillingham,	Lodge,	Platt, Conn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, on page 3, after line 11.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, is there not an amendment pending offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK]?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such an amendment was not offered, but it was sent to the desk.

Mr. LODGE. I do not see the Senator from Tennessee here. I should like to have that amendment read, and then I will offer it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts desire to offer the amendment which has been sent to the desk by the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. LODGE. I offer it as an amendment, and ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 14, after the word "boat," it is proposed to strike out "of the type of the Protector, manufactured by the Lake Torpedo Boat Company," and in lieu thereof to insert "of such type as he may, after careful test and examination, approve."

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the entire amendment be now read as it will read if amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment as proposed to be amended will now be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of War in his discretion to purchase for the School of Submarine Defense for experimental work one submarine torpedo boat of such type as he may, after careful test and examination, approve, not to exceed, in the judgment and discretion of the Secretary of War, $250,000: Provided, That before said submarine torpedo boat is purchased or accepted by the War Department it shall have been fully tested to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War and shall fulfill all reasonable requirements for coast defense.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BERRY. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). Owing to the absence on account of illness of the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], with whom I have a general pair, I withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MCENERY (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], who is not present, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. FULTON (when Mr. MITCHELL'S name was called). I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. MITCHELL] is necessarily absent from the city because of the death of his daughter.

Mr. SCOTT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO]; but I do not believe this is a question on which I should decline to vote, as Senators do not appear to be voting on party lines. Therefore I shall take the liberty of voting. I vote "nay."

Mr. MALLORY (when Mr. TALIAFERRO'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. TALIAFERRO] is absent on account of sickness.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MONEY. My colleague [Mr. MCLAURIN] is absent on account of sickness in his family. He is paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. FOSTER]. I do not know how my colleague would vote if present.

Mr. FOSTER of Louisiana (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. He being absent from the Senate, I will withdraw my vote.

Mr. GIBSON (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KEARNS], who is not present. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. DUBOIS. I inquire if the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], with whom I have a general pair, has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. DUBOIS. Then I withhold my vote.

Mr. PATTERSON (after having voted in the negative). Mr. President, I ask if the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE], with whom I have a general pair, has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the Senator from South Dakota has not voted.

Mr. PATTERSON. Then I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 25, as follows:

YEAS—24.

Bacon,	Clay,	Hoar,	Martin,
Berry,	Daniel,	Kean,	Money,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the committee, on page 9, which was passed over. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, after line 9, it is proposed to strike out the following:

For procurement of land needed as sites for the defenses of the Hawaiian Islands, $200,000.

Mr. LODGE. If I may, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill why that provision was stricken out?

Mr. PERKINS. The appropriation was in the bill for the purpose of acquiring sites for fortifications near Honolulu, in Pearl Harbor, in one of the Hawaiian Islands. The estimated cost of the land was $525,000. By inquiry at the Department we ascertained that the Government had no bond and no option upon this land, and while the members of the committee believed it proper and in the line of the purchase of necessary sites for fortifications, they did not believe it wise or expedient to appropriate $200,000, which could not be used to advantage.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Do I understand the Senator to say that we have no fortifications in the Hawaiian Islands, nor sites for the same?

Mr. PERKINS. Nothing that we have appropriated for, except in the general appropriation for insular fortifications, which is in the discretion of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. At the present time are there any fortifications in the Hawaiian Islands?

Mr. PERKINS. There are no fortifications there.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Nor any sites for fortifications?

Mr. PERKINS. No. Our experience has been where the Government has acquired sites for fortifications, as well as for public buildings, that a sufficient amount should be appropriated to purchase all the land that may be required.

Your committee, therefore, believed that it was the part of wise legislation for the Department to come to Congress with a definite recommendation for an appropriation after they had secured an option upon sufficient land for the erection of the required fortifications.

In my own State, where we desired to purchase land for public buildings, it was found that it was only an invitation for those who had lots adjoining to put up the price when we required more land. Therefore your committee believed it wise, as I stated before, to make no appropriation this year and in the meantime to request the Department to have an estimate and an option on whatever land may be deemed necessary.

Mr. FORAKER. I should like to ask the Senator, before he takes his seat, whether this estimated cost of $500,000 for land on which to erect fortifications contemplates that there shall be only one place where fortifications shall be erected? Is it not true that fortifications are contemplated at additional points?

Mr. PERKINS. That is very true. Perhaps I had better read what finally determined the committee in their recommendation.

Mr. FORAKER. May I further ask the Senator, before I sit down, if he will allow me, whether or not for $200,000 there could not be procured ample grounds for fortifications at some of the points where it is contemplated that fortifications shall be erected?

Mr. PERKINS. We have no bond and no option upon any land there, so the Department informed us.

Mr. FORAKER. I understand there is no bond and no option, but there was knowledge, as I understand it, before the committee of the House of Representatives, where the provision was framed, and also knowledge before the committee that struck out the House provision. I am inquiring simply for information.

Mr. PERKINS. The estimates for this bill, Mr. President, were $21,573,197. It has been cut down from the estimates to $7,637,192. Therefore, when we increased the appropriations in the bill in the Senate we had this provision under consideration as well as many others that were presented to us. After presenting the matter to the Board of Engineers we received a communication from them, and while urging the appropriation of the full amount they had asked for, they made this statement:

> This increase is respectfully recommended. If, however, the committee can not see its way clear to such increase in the aggregate of the bill, and some item must be correspondingly decreased, it is suggested that the item of $200,000 for land in Hawaii is the one which will probably best stand a reduction, while no work of construction at Pearl Harbor with funds here appropriated is anticipated. Such reduction in the land item would, nevertheless, be regretted. The fortifying of Pearl Harbor and Honolulu is of much importance, and as no work can be commenced until land is purchased, it is desirable that as early action be taken in such land purchase as is practicable. The total cost of such land is, however, estimated at $526,000, and even with an appropriation of $200,000 but a portion of the desired land could be secured.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from California will permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. We have no fortifications, I understand, at Pearl Harbor?

Mr. PERKINS. We have none.

Mr. SPOONER. Does not the Senator think it is time we entered upon the work of fortifying the Hawaiian Islands?

Mr. PERKINS. There is no question of it.

Mr. SPOONER. Shall we wait until there is immediate use for fortifications?

Mr. PERKINS. There is no question but that we should fortify not only Pearl Harbor and Honolulu Harbor and Diamond Head, but also the five forts named—Manila and Subig Bay, San Luis d'Apra, Guam, and San Juan, P. R.

Mr. SPOONER. There is this difference, if the Senator makes that observation by way of argument, that Hawaii is one of the organized Territories of the United States. The Philippines are not. Neither is Porto Rico in the sense that Hawaii is. I have always supposed that at a reasonably early day the United States would enter upon the work of adequately fortifying the Hawaiian Islands. I see no reason—perhaps the Senator can give me one—why we should not appropriate the money for the acquisition of the land necessary for that purpose.

Mr. PERKINS. That is precisely our view, Mr. President. I am in full accord with the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator—he being in agreement with me upon that proposition—whether the money necessary for acquiring the lands necessary for that purpose is not estimated for?

Mr. PERKINS. It is. But the Department assured me that they had no bond, no option, no guaranty that it could be purchased for the amount they estimated.

Mr. SPOONER. I understand it will take about $512,000.

Mr. PERKINS. Five hundred and twenty-six thousand dollars, they estimate.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator, I suppose, has no doubt that the Government of the United States has power to condemn whatever land we require for that purpose?

Mr. PERKINS. When we will be ready to appropriate the money.

Mr. LODGE. Is it not unusual to appropriate the money after condemnation?

Mr. PERKINS. The Department has not recommended it. We should be only too glad to recommend an amendment if we had a recommendation from the Department.

Mr. SPOONER. The Department has estimated. The Department does not generally estimate for things it does not recommend, I understand. It has estimated five hundred and odd thousand dollars for the acquisition of the necessary land in the Hawaiian Islands. If that money were appropriated, it would mean what? It would not mean that the Government would thereby be at the mercy of some real estate ring. It would mean that the land was to be acquired by purchase where it could be acquired by purchase at a fair price, and where it could not be acquired by purchase at a fair price, under the general laws of the United States, which have been extended in that particular to Hawaii, that the land should be acquired by condemnation, the money having been appropriated to pay for it.

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator, I think, misunderstands the position of the committee upon this matter.

Mr. SPOONER. I evidently do.

Mr. PERKINS. I believe if a recommendation had come from the Department that this land could be secured for $526,000, as they estimate, there would have been very few, if any, dissenting votes in the committee against it. I should have had no objection, certainly; and if the Senate should now decide to make an appropriation of $526,000, I certainly shall not object.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me, is it the idea of the committee to wait until the Department shall have obtained bonds or options which will bring the price of the necessary land to five hundred or five hundred and fifty thousand dollars?

Mr. PERKINS. The object of the committee was not to appropriate $200,000 when they had no assurance that they could get the land or any part of the land.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me, I think the committee is entirely right about that. It seems to me it is the only phase of the subject concerning which the committee is right.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me to ask him a question coming in exactly at this point, what I have been trying to find out is what is the estimated cost of the site for fortifications at Pearl Harbor?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Five hundred and twenty-six thousand dollars.

Mr. FORAKER. No; $526,000 is the estimated cost of all these sites. Now, I understand at Pearl Harbor, which is the most important of all, we are to have a site which will not cost us $200,000 for all the ground necessary.

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator's opinion differs from that of the committee.

Mr. FORAKER. It is not an opinion. I am asking for information.

Mr. PERKINS. We had no assurance from the Department that any sufficient quantity of land could be purchased for the $200,000, or that it was deemed expedient or businesslike to buy it. However, if the Senator desires to offer an amendment to this bill making the amount $526,000, the estimate, we have no objection.

Mr. SPOONER. I have this feeling about it, and I will take only a moment: That Territory belongs to the United States. Its people belong to the United States. It is under the protection of the United States. It is far outlying in the Pacific Ocean. It is difficult somewhat of access for war ships. We can not always have an adequate fleet, and perhaps might not be able to utilize an adequate fleet, for the protection of those islands, and it seems to me a plain duty of the United States, which must protect that people at all hazards, as it must protect those who live under its flag, to make timely and adequate provision for their protection without reliance upon the Navy solely.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is for our own protection.

Mr. SPOONER. It is for our own protection.

Mr. PERKINS. I can not permit my friend to put me or the committee in the position of being inimical to an appropriation for fortifying Honolulu or Pearl Harbor. The point is simply this: The $200,000 that was in the bill is simply an invitation for landholders to advance the price. Appropriate the amount necessary to buy land sufficient for fortifications, and we are with you.

Mr. SPOONER. The committee is the tribunal, if I may call it such, which ordinarily recommends appropriations to the Senate. This whole acquisition, I understand, was estimated for by the Department. That means, if it means anything, if there is any intelligence behind the departmental action, that the Department recommends it.

I agree entirely with the Senator from California, and every other Senator will agree with him——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Why do you not offer an amendment?

Mr. SPOONER. I am making a speech at the Senator from California, and I can not get him to listen.

Mr. PERKINS. I am all patience and am listening with great benefit to myself, for the Senator from Wisconsin never speaks without those within hearing of his voice getting some information, as well as being edified.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not so intent upon edifying the Senator as I am upon informing him of my opinion.

Mr. PERKINS. We do not differ at all in the object we have in view. It is only the way of getting at it.

Mr. SPOONER. I was about to agree with the Senator from California.

Mr. PERKINS. I am delighted.

Mr. SPOONER. If it will not offend him, I entirely agree with the proposition of the Senator, that if this property is to cost $550,000 it would be childish to the uttermost for us to appropriate $200,000 for that purpose.

Mr. PERKINS. That is the view of your committee.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not agree with him that because the Department is not able to guarantee that all the land can be acquired for $550,000 we should wait indefinitely before beginning the work of fortifying adequately those islands, and of course to begin the work we must acquire the necessary land.

I understand we have acquired Pearl Harbor, for which we paid seventy-odd million dollars in remitted duties on sugar, and have not any land upon which to place fortifications for its protection. I did not suppose that was the situation.

Mr. PERKINS. It is one of the mistakes which was made when the harbor was purchased not to buy sufficient land with it.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator think it ought to be rectified at the earliest possible moment?

Mr. PERKINS. I certainly do.

Mr. SPOONER. Is there any way to rectify it except to appropriate $550,000 for that purpose?

Mr. PERKINS. That is for the Senate to determine. It is a question of policy.

Mr. SPOONER. I will prepare an amendment.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I entirely agree with all that has been suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin. I think we should be making provision to fortify Hawaii. It has been my understanding, however, that we were to erect fortifications at a number of points, and of course, therefore, we were to secure sites for fortifications at a number of points. It was my impression—I do not know how I got it—that when in the House they incorporated this provision that $200,000 should be appropriated it was a sufficient amount to secure the sites at the most important places to be fortified. The idea was to commence the fortifications by securing sites with the $200,000.

Now, I have just looked at the estimate of the Department, and find that it does not mention the sites separately. It simply in a lump sum estimates $526,000 for sites for fortifications in Hawaii. If we are to do all or to do nothing, I am heartily in favor of doing all. Therefore, I suggest that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to offer an amendment.

Mr. LODGE. We want to disagree to the committee amendment first.

Mr. FORAKER. We want first to disagree to the committee amendment, and then to insert "$526,000" instead of "$200,000."

Mr. SPOONER. I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. LODGE. The first step is to disagree to the committee amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. The first step is for the Senate to disagree to the committee amendment, and then to amend the bill by inserting "$526,000" instead of "$200,000."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPOONER. I move to amend the bill by striking out "$200,000" and inserting "$526,000."

Mr. FORAKER. "Five hundred and twenty-six thousand one hundred dollars."

Mr. SPOONER. "Five hundred and twenty-six thousand one hundred dollars."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin offers an amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 11, it is proposed to strike out "two hundred thousand" before "dollars" and insert "five hundred and twenty-six thousand one hundred;" so as to read:

For procurement of land needed as sites for the defenses of the Hawaiian Islands, $526,100.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole will be concurred in in gross.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the amendment relating to the Lake torpedo boat be reserved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be reserved. The question is on concurring in the other amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer what I send to the desk as a substitute for the amendment of the committee which was agreed to in Committee of the Whole on the subject of the Lake torpedo boat.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the committee amendment on page 3, beginning in line 11 and ending with line 21, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

The Secretary of War is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to contract for or purchase for the School of Submarine Defense, for experimental purposes, one submarine torpedo boat, at a cost not exceeding $250,000: Provided, That prior to said purchase or contract for said boat any American inventor or owner of a submarine torpedo boat may give reasonable notice and have his, her, or its submarine torpedo boat tested by comparison or competition, or both, with a Government submarine torpedo boat or any private competitor, provided there be any such, and thereupon the board appointed for conducting such tests shall report the result of said competition or comparison, together with its recommendations, to the Secretary of War, who may purchase or contract for a submarine torpedo boat in a manner that will best advance the interests of the United States in torpedo or submarine warfare and coast defense.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the question of agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DUBOIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON].

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK]. Has he voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. SPOONER. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Washington [Mr. ANKENY], and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], which I transfer to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (after having voted in the negative). As the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], with whom I am paired, has not voted, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MONEY. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. MCLAURIN] is absent on account of sickness in his family, and has a general pair with the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. LATIMER (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to inquire if the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. LATIMER. I desire to withdraw my vote, being paired with that Senator.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I suggest to the Senator from South Carolina that we make an exchange of pairs, so that he and I can vote. That will allow the junior Senator from Illinois to stand paired with the junior Senator from Missouri.

Mr. LATIMER. That is satisfactory. I will allow my vote to remain.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I vote "nay."

Mr. HOAR. Has the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. HOAR. I am paired with the Senator from Alabama.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 36, as follows:

COAL AND ASPHALT LANDS IN THE CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW NATIONS, IND. T.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11126) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to add to the segregation of coal and asphalt lands in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, Ind. T.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and empowered to segregate and reserve from allotment, and to cancel any filings or applications that may heretofore have been made with a view to allotting the following-described lands, situate in the Choctaw Nation, to wit: The north half of the south half of the southeast quarter, and the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 9; the north half of the south half of the south half of section 10; the north half of the south half of the south half of section 11, and the north half of the south half of the southwest quarter of section 12, all in township 5 north, range 19 east, containing 250 acres, more or less; and the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 8, township 5 north, range 19 east, and the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter of section 7, township 5 north, range 19 east, containing 80 acres, more or less.

SEC. 2. That the provisions of sections 56 to 63, inclusive, of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1902, entitled "An act to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes, and for other purposes," be, and the same are hereby, made applicable to the lands above described, the same as if the said described lands had been made a part of the segregation, as contemplated by said sections 56 to 63, inclusive, of said above act approved July 1, 1902: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, add said lands to and make them a part of the coal and asphalt mining leases now in effect, and to which said lands above described are contiguous, the lands in each case to be added to and made a part of the lease to which they are adjacent and which they join, Government subdivisions being followed as nearly as possible.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

On page 2, line 22, after the word "following," add the following:

"Provided further, That the holder or holders of the lease or leases to which such lands shall be added shall, before the same are added, pay the Indian or Indians who have filed upon or applied for such lands as their allotments, or who are in possession thereof, the value of the improvements on the lands, such value to be determined under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior."

Add the following section:

"SEC. 3. That the Choctaw, Oklahoma and Gulf Railroad Company is hereby authorized and empowered to sublet, assign, transfer, and set over the leases which it now has upon coal lands in the Choctaw Nation, Indian Territory, or any of them. The assignees or sublessees of said Choctaw, Oklahoma and Gulf Railroad Company shall file good and sufficient bonds for the faithful performance of the terms of the original leases, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, there is a verbal amendment to be made to section 2, on page 3; after the word "improvements," in line 4, insert the word "placed;" and at the end of said line, after the word "land," insert the words "said Indian or Indians."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 4, page 3, after the word "improvements," insert the word "placed;" and after the word "land," in same line, insert the words "by the said Indian or Indians."

The amendments to the amendment were agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to add to the segregation of coal and asphalt lands in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, Ind. T., and for other purposes."

On motion of Mr. SHACKLEFORD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. BOUTELL in the chair).

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, it is my desire to address the House upon the increase of national expenditures. This increase is notable in all civilized countries, whether great or small and whatever may be their form of government. It will be profitable to examine into the history and causes of this increase, to investigate whether any dangerous tendencies arise from it, and to attempt to point out a proper policy to be pursued. The average annual expenditures of the United States Government in the last decade of the eighteenth century were $6,835,000. They were greatly increased by the war of 1812, in the decade from 1811 to 1820, but the following decade showed a decrease, and the annual average in the decade ending in 1860 was only $60,000,000. This was followed by the enormous expense of the civil war, and an average annual expenditure approaching ten times as much, or amounting to $530,000,000.

The closing decade of the last century showed an annual average of $407,000,000. If we deduct from the expenditures of the first decade of the Republic interest charges, which were large because of the assumption of State debts and other expenses growing out of the war for independence, the annual average in the last decade of the nineteenth century was very nearly 100 times as great as in the decade from 1791 to 1800, and if we take the last two years for comparison—1902 and 1903—we find them more than 100 times as great. Though the ratio of augmentation has not at all times been so rapid, the same tendency is manifest in all the leading European countries. Two dates may be selected after which there was a notable growth, the years 1830 and 1880. There was a prevalent opinion about the year 1820 that national expenses had reached their maximum. M. Villèle, finance minister of King Louis XVIII, in bringing in a budget in 1822, pointed out that it carried a billion of francs, and made the remark, "Salute these figures, gentlemen; you will never have opportunity to contemplate them again," but he himself lived to see twenty-five budgets exceeding one billion of francs and to a time when the annual average was one and a half billion.

The increase in the years succeeding 1830 was contemporaneous with increase of wealth. If we seek for a date which may be most appropriately regarded as the beginning of the present era of industry and progress we will select the year 1815, the close of the Napoleonic wars. After that year there were decided changes. Influenced by the exhaustion and bloodshed of constant conflicts, controlling forces in diplomacy made a change in the policy of Europe. Instead of a period in which war was continuous, one ensued in which peace was predominant. The individual was more and the state was less. There was a growing and potent sentiment to the effect that the activities of the people should not be guided and shaped for the aggrandizement of the sovereign or the gratification of his ambitions, but for the common benefit of his subjects. An era of invention had commenced at the close of the preceding century, but its benefits had been suspended because of uninterrupted strife. In the fifteen years succeeding 1815 these inventions were made effective, and to them were added great improvements in transportation by the beginnings of railways, the construction and operation of canals, and the development of steam navigation.

With this enlargement of wealth and of the means of communication it was but a normal result that there should be an increase in expenditure. Another period of increase commenced in the year 1880. By a comparison of the year 1880 with the year 1902, it will appear that the expenditures of France have increased 15 per cent; those of Italy, 26 per cent; those of the United States, 76 per cent; those of Austria-Hungary, 83 per cent; of Great Britain, 134 per cent; of Russia, 180 per cent; of Germany, 334 per cent.

The great increase in Great Britain is in a large measure explained by the expenses of the South African war, and in Russia by the very large amounts expended for building the Siberian Railway, and for the construction of other railways, or taking over the railways formerly owned and operated by private companies.

The Bureau of Labor has kindly prepared certain figures relating to European countries, which, with the consent of the committee, I will file as an exhibit. These figures, however, as showing the relative increase in each, are misleading and to an extent illusory. If we compare the budgets of different nations or compare a budget of the same country in different periods there are three sources from which erroneous conclusions may be derived.

The first is one of bookkeeping merely. A familiar illustration can be derived from the policy of different countries in counting receipts from customs and other sources of taxation. Formerly it was the general practice to count as revenue merely the net amount collected. In the year 1817 a change in France by which the expenses for collection of revenue were counted with other expenditures added to the annual expense account about $24,000,000, and a similar change in Great Britain in 1856 increased the budget by $22,500,000. The prevalent tendency of late is to count the expenses of collecting revenue with other expenses of the government.

Other illustrations of different methods of bookkeeping may be found in the treatment of the income and expenditure of certain activities of the Government. In our own statement of expenditures only the net deficit accruing from the operation of the Post-Office Department is counted. Such was the case in Germany twenty years ago, but now the income of the Post-Office Department is counted on the one side as a receipt and expenditures on the other side. A similar increase arises from the operation of the German state railways. These figures go far to explain the enormous percentage of increase in the expenditures of that country.

A second source of error in comparisons may be found in the different scope of the activities of the state. For instance, a majority of the nations of continental Europe construct, own, and operate railways, and the expenses upon them account very largely for the greater magnitude of the budget.

The third source of error may be found in the different boundary lines between national or federal and local expenditure. For example, in this country 30 per cent of the total amount collected for national, State, and local expenditure goes to the Federal Government. In France the percentage is twice as much, or approximately 60 per cent. The difference in the scope of the enterprises undertaken by the central government may be well illustrated by the number of employees of the two countries. The Civil Service Commission reports that there are 235,000 civil employees of the United States Government. The number has greatly increased in recent years. Of these 235,000, 72,000 are in fourth-class post-offices. France has a population one-half that of the United States; but, according to a statement issued in 1896, there were 466,000 employees of the central government, and at the rate of increase in the preceding decade it is probable that the present number is half a million. Many of the salaries are very small, but this comparison illustrates the very considerable difference between the activities which center in the Federal Government.

There may be said to be two general causes for the increase of national expenditures. One works automatically without the interposition of the legislature. It arises from the necessary enlargement of existing public functions due to the growth of population, to the expansion of territory, and to the higher range of salaries which is correlative with the diminishing purchasing power of money and contemporaneous with improved standards of living.

The second may be said to be under the control of the legislature. Chief among those of this class is the ever-swelling demand for the enlargement of military establishments, the army and the navy. It is to be noticed that this increase exists contemporaneously with a general condition of peace, interrupted by occasional war. The greater cost is due in some degree to improved varieties of armament and equipment employed in war and in a measure to different political ideals. It can not be said that expenses for the army and navy are entirely under the control of the political power, though in a large degree they are. They depend in part upon the position of a state among nations, but more upon the general policy which the dominant influences in each government may choose to adopt.

In no country has the increase in military expenses been so marked as in our own. In the year 1880 the total expenses for the Army and Navy were $42,000,000—twenty-eight millions for the Army and fourteen millions for the Navy. In 1902 these expenses had increased to four times as much. The naval establishment cost in 1902 more than five times as much as in 1880, and under the appropriation bill passed for 1905 it will cost more than seven times as much. The increase between 1902 and 1905 will be more than twice as much as the total cost in 1880.

Another cause of the increase of national expenditures is the enlargement of the scope of the undertakings and enterprises of the state. In this there is found a great question of public policy relating to the dividing line between public and private initiative. It is readily to be noticed that there is a manifest difference in the nature and objects of the two.

Private undertakings look to an immediate return. They are based upon calculations in which the question is considered whether an income can readily be derived from them, so that the venture will prosper as a business or commercial enterprise. National expenditures are based in great degree upon political and social ideals. They look to the ultimate rather than to the immediate future. They should look to the uplifting of the people, to the improvement of industrial conditions, and to betterment in social and moral conditions as well. In this connection it is gratifying to notice that along with the great increase in the expense of war there is one ray of light, for no one item in the budgets of the different civilized countries has shown so large a ratio of increase in the last fifty years as the provision for education. Our own country has shown a constant growth in this particular, but the percentage of increase has been even greater in European countries in recent years than in our own, because an earlier beginning was made here.

Expenses have sometimes been divided into protective and developmental—protective, those which are for the safety of the state, its army, its navy, its police force—things which protect against foreign aggression and against crime and disorder at home; the developmental include those that look to the future, such as public improvements.

Without wishing to add to some remarks made in this House some weeks since, I think it due to say that the proper balance should be struck between these two kinds of expenditure. Everyone will realize that reasonable protection is necessary. The national feeling is perhaps the strongest general impulse among those who owe allegiance to any country; and the defense of the state at home and abroad, the maintenance of its proper prestige, the protection of its citizens in foreign lands, and due provision for the enlargement of its trade and other activities should be taken into account. Danger arises, however, when we allow enthusiasm or misguided patriotism to carry us beyond an ideal which is rational and appropriate for a people whose traditions and interests look toward peace.

In this connection I desire to state that, contrary to what is perhaps a prevalent impression, the burden of national taxation has not increased in this country as rapidly as wealth. We have official statistics of wealth for census years, beginning in the year 1850. It will appear that in 1850 the average wealth per capita of each inhabitant of the United States was $307; in 1860, $513; in 1870, $779; in 1880, $850; in 1890, $1,038; in 1900, while the census statistics are not complete, an estimate made by the Bureau of Statistics places the figure at $1,235.

The expenditure for national purposes in the year 1850 was a little more than one-half of 1 per cent of the wealth of the country. In 1860 it dropped to less than four-tenths. In 1870, for the first and only decennial year, it exceeded 1 per cent. In 1880 it fell to six-tenths of 1 per cent. In 1890 it was forty-eight one-hundredths. In 1900 it increased to fifty-one one-hundreths.

The comparison, however, is clearer if we take a specified year as the basis. Taking the year 1850 as the basis, and representing it by the figure 100, it appears that in three years at the end of decades, the burden of taxation upon wealth was less than in 1850. Those are the years 1860, 1890, and 1900. Counting 1850 as 100, the burden in 1860 was 70; in 1870 (increased by the civil war), 185; in 1880, 113; in 1890, 87; in 1900, 93.

But these figures should not be our excuse for extravagance. They should, on the contrary, lead us to adopt a policy of conservatism and of the utmost care. It may well be questioned whether it is not an essential requisite—or, if not essential, at least preferable—for the development of a people, that the burden of taxation should be diminished from year to year, so that the standard of living may be raised and capital may always be ready for the numerous enterprises which are necessary for the development of commerce and industry and for increasing the wealth of the people. Thus we can not be excused by the enormous advance in the wealth of the country if we allow ourselves to indulge in any line of expenditures which has in it any taint of extravagance.

There are numerous propositions before the country at present with reference to which discussion will arise. They largely belong to the question of the scope of enterprises of the central Government. A proposition is now pending for the expenditure of very large amounts for improvement or construction of public roads in the United States. It is not claimed that these have to do with interstate commerce. The argument for them is the improved condition which will arise from improved methods of communication between local communities. Good roads would confer an economic benefit because the products of the farm would be more readily carried to market. They would confer a social benefit because there would be readier means of intercourse between town and country and neighboring localities. They have their advantages, all must admit; but we come here to a question which goes to the very essence of all government—can they be provided for most wisely by the central Government, by States, or by local governments?

It would seem that the rule can be derived from the experience of States and communities that expenses are most judicious, are most carefully applied to public objects, are disbursed most economically and efficiently when and in proportion as there is an immediate local interest in the use to which they are applied. And in the same manner improvements and expenditures are kept within well-considered limits in proportion as those who immediately bear the burden decide what undertakings shall be entered upon.

There is also a proposition pending here for a great increase of the pension list. No one will hesitate to vote for any measure which gives due reward to the soldiers of the civil war. In their old age they will be supported, and if they are suffering from wounds or disease, whatever the Government can do for their support will be done, even though it takes the last scruple in the Treasury. But the question must naturally arise, Under what rule should this appropriation be made? Are we willing to establish in this country the standard that for patriotism, for devotion to country, the reward and the chief reward must be in dollars that are raised by national taxation? [Applause.] I do not speak at this time as one opposing this proposition, but to present the question as to what the proper rule should be in this particular.

The pending measure, known as the "post-office appropriation bill," now carries the largest sum of any of the appropriation bills considered by Congress. It recommends for the postal service an aggregate of $169,996,588.75, an increase of more than $16,000,000 over the amount appropriated for the current year, more than twice as much as for the year 1894, two and one-half times as much as for 1890, and more than four and one-half times as much as for 1880.

The Post-Office Department should respond in an exceptional degree to the growth of the country, but so marked an increase makes it desirable to examine into some of its features. In recent years the gain has been greatest in the rural free-delivery service, which has multiplied in cost from $448,000 in 1900, the first year in which it was fully established, to $8,000,000 in 1903, and the proposed expenditure for the ensuing year of 1905 is $20,773,700. So rapid a multiplication of cost is worthy of careful scrutiny. It would be difficult to find an instance in any budget in which there is such a surprising increase in the cost of any branch of the public service. It can not be denied that this service costs nearly five times as much as any revenue derived from it or connected with it. Save Russia, the post-office is a paying institution in practically all of the countries of Europe. While this may not be in accordance with our own policy, the balance of expenses over income in the past has not been large, and the very large expense of this Department threatens to create an additional and undue enlargement of the burdens of taxation.

A statement forwarded me by the bookkeeping department of the Treasury shows that the sum of $25,717,752.85 has been appropriated for expositions. This amount includes the cost of representation in foreign countries, for which inconsiderable sums were expended twenty and even forty years ago; but more than half of the total has been appropriated within the last six years. I am unable to state how much has been or will be repaid. Some of these expositions have commemorated great events of universal interest to all the people, and all of them are associated with occurrences or enterprises more or less interesting, but the disposition to seek national aid has become more and more manifest, so that it will not be long before an exposition in every State will have preferred its demand for an appropriation from the National Treasury. It will be easy to find in each some historical incident so notable as to furnish a basis for the claim that its anniversary should be elaborately celebrated and the National Government bear a large share of the cost. It is well to consider whether the inevitable magnitude of these demands should not cause the abandonment of this class of appropriations, or at least their limitation to an amount sufficient for a suitable governmental exhibit. Every doubtful use of public moneys is not only objectionable in itself, but doubly so in the precedent which it establishes.

The comparative financial condition of the Federal Government on the one side and that of States and municipalities on the other exercise a potent influence upon the situation. The burden of local taxation and of debt, especially in municipalities, is increasing at a very rapid rate. In addition, the fact that so large a share of the national revenues is raised by indirect taxation renders the weight of national taxation seemingly much less oppressive. These reasons and the existence of a surplus in the Treasury tend to create demands upon the National Government for projects and expenditures which otherwise would be undertaken by the States or smaller political divisions.

The increase of deficiency appropriations is to be noted. Supplemental or deficiency budgets are quite common in all countries. It must be conceded that they are undesirable and dangerous to the best ordered administration. Under our parliamentary methods, however, there is an additional danger. A committee or subcommittee may frame a bill for a branch of the public service and seek to secure economy and at the same time sufficient provision for the public functions in question. Afterwards, the amounts recommended and adopted by Congress may be exhausted by some Department of the Government, expenses may be applied for purposes or to an extent which the committee would not have approved, yet another committee or subcommittee not equally familiar with the subject may promptly provide the amount.

I desire to touch briefly upon some of the dangers which pertain to our system of making appropriations and raising revenue and to some of its characteristic features.

The most characteristic feature can be expressed in one word—the word "severance." First, the severance of the executive department from the legislative; next, the severance of the committees or branches of the legislature which provide the revenue from those which determine expenditures, and, third, the severance of the committees which consider estimates and present appropriation bills.

In some governments an entirely different plan is in vogue. The budget is practically prepared, presented, and carried to a vote, or adopted without a vote, by the executive department of the government. In nearly all it has a more controlling influence. But this is not in accordance with our theory of government. There is no lack of reliance upon estimates of the executive department in the making up of our list of expenses in this country.

In early days an able Secretary of the Treasury might almost dominate all classes of expenditures, determine the aggregate amount and the distribution. This was true in the days of Hamilton and of Gallatin, when the executive branch overshadowed the legislative branch. At present the committees of Congress in making up the respective bills consult with no single official. The heads of the different Departments are called upon for information about the needs of the respective branches of the public service. Subordinates in the different Departments are also brought in and questioned about what they want, each with his different ideas concerning the theory of national expenditure, and with even more widely divergent ideas relating to the scale of expenditures to be adopted in his Department. This makes it impossible for any estimate prepared in the executive department to be adequate or controlling or even to exercise more than a limited influence upon the aggregate of national expenditures. When a bill is presented to the President for his approval he must accept or reject it in its entirety. If he should interpose a veto the desirable items of the measure can not be separated from those which he regards as objectionable.

Congress has guarded with great care—and it is not a mere claim of the prerogative of Congress, but is based upon the Constitution itself—the right to determine revenues and expenditures. When estimates come here one committee determines the ways and means of providing revenue, and other committees, quite numerous, determine what shall be expended.

At an earlier time, both in the year when the Committee on Ways and Means was formed and later when it was made a standing committee and endowed with certain prerogatives, that committee controlled not alone revenue but expenditure, and this continued practically until the year 1865. Numerous reasons have been given for the division of the functions of this committee. Those which were accepted then as entirely adequate were that the labor had become too large for one committee and that too much power was lodged in one body of this House. Consequently the Committee on Appropriations was formed in the year 1865. After that different appropriation bills, one by one, were assigned to other committees, leaving a mere minority of appropriation bills with the Committee on Appropriations.

Now, it is evident that under any such system it is impossible to properly harmonize the aggregate of expenses and of receipts, and if changing conditions arise and one is lowered and the other raised, it is exceedingly difficult to make intelligent provision for the changed situation. Not only is the general management of receipts and expenditures intrusted to separate committees, but the control of the expenses of the different branches of the Government is dispersed among many committees. One committee may have an idea "we should have for our department a very large amount." Another committee may think the same. Still another may be dominated by principles and ideas which look toward economy. Numerous suggestions have been made. Perhaps one of the most practicable would be to have a general committee, composed of the heads of all appropriation committees, which should begin with each session, examine the estimates, and make out approximately the amount which each should receive.

In this connection there is another danger in our system. That is in the relation between the House and the Senate. In some countries the upper house has the right merely to approve or disapprove an appropriation bill as an entirety and not to add, though perhaps to subtract.

Now, in mentioning the danger of having two bodies, one of which may originate but the other may indefinitely amend appropriation bills, no disparagement is expressed for either. If responsibility were left to the sole control of either, no doubt the work would be properly done; but one House will have its opinions concerning an appropriation, and the other House will have very dissimilar opinions upon the same. One body will enlarge a certain appropriation bill or specific items of it to a maximum, and the other body will enlarge another appropriation bill or some of its items to a maximum. The result is a tendency to a maximum in all expenses. The object most to be desired is that the legislative body or other agency having the preparation of the bills making appropriations should have undivided responsibility, and should frame the bills according to established principles, with a well-defined standard of the comparative importance of claims upon the Treasury. It is practically impossible that the standards of two separate coordinate Houses should be the same.

I wish to call attention here to some very great advantages which have been gained. While there has been a growing tendency toward diffusion or dispersion of responsibility through all these years, on the other hand there has been a stricter attention to details, and with it an insistence upon a greater degree of accountability.

The first appropriation bill passed by the House of Representatives became a law September 29, 1789. It contained just twelve and one-half lines and provided for only four items of expenditure—the civil list, Department of War, warrants issued by the late board of the Treasury, and pensions to invalids. That which became a law March 26, 1790, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1790," contained a little less than two pages, and is given in seven sections.

The first section is very similar to the act of 1789. Then follow some more specific appropriations in the other sections. Second, expenses arising from and incident to the sessions of Congress; third, contingent charges of the Government; fourth, building of a light-house on Cape Henry and expenses arising from the act for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers; fifth, personal and miscellaneous claims, including interest on loans; sixth, personal claims. The seventh section authorizes the making of loans.

The third act—of 1791—contains two and two-thirds pages, and specifies the civil list, War Department, and certain specified objects.

Passing on, the act of 1794 contains two and two-thirds pages. That of 1795 contains less than three pages. Among the paragraphs we will find this item, which shows the primitive conditions, and comparatively small appropriations of that day and at the same time the growing disposition to be more specific:

For the expense of firewood and candles for the several offices of the Treasury Department, except the Treasurer's office, $1,500.

Later on these appropriations are divided, separate military, naval, and other bills appearing, and the present system is a gradual outgrowth from that, but with greatly enhanced attention to details in recent years.

Some writers in treating of these subjects have stated that in the earlier history of the Government appropriations were only made for the respective Departments and were there expended by the different Cabinet officers for such purposes as they pleased.

This statement is hardly accurate unless it is limited to a very few years, but it is evident that at that time much greater discretion was left to the different Cabinets and bureaus. New positions were created without the authority of Congress, and salaries were raised to a very considerable extent. The constitutional provision compelling a report of expenditures from time to time was not held to compel annual reports until the year 1800.

A salutary check upon wastefulness was accomplished by the acts of July 12, 1870, and June 20, 1874. These measures were advocated by Mr. Dawes and Mr. Garfield, and required that after two years unused appropriations, excepting those for permanent specific appropriations, rivers and harbors, light-houses, fortifications, public buildings, or the pay of the Navy and Marine Corps, should be covered into the Treasury. The first measure returned to the Treasury $174,000,000 of accumulated unexpended balances. In a single bureau there was an unexpended balance of $36,000,000, the accumulations of a quarter of a century.

Although the manner of regulating income and expenditure in Great Britain is determined in accordance with different ideas upon fundamental principles of government, it will be interesting to give a brief sketch of it, because many have regarded it as the best now in vogue in any country. Estimates are prepared for the different departments by the ministers and supervised by the chancellor of the exchequer. After the speech from the throne demanding supplies, and a vote in response, the whole house resolves itself into what is called a "committee of supply." The estimates are presented by the ministers, and the whole subject is discussed. The committee then makes its recommendations in the form of a report to the house. The house then resolves itself into the committee of the whole on "ways and means" to determine the methods by which the expenditures recommended may be provided.

It will be noticed that this is done after a full discussion and understanding of the amount to be raised. If it is necessary to raise or lower the income tax or the tax on tea, it is done. If it is necessary to impose an export tax on coal or create any other form of revenue, that is done. As stated by Mr. May, the Crown demands money, the Commons grant it, and the Lords assent to the grant. Mr. Gladstone in 1866 laid down the rule that the constitutional duty of the legislative chamber is not to augment, but to decrease expenditure. This principle is a natural outgrowth of the methods employed. The Commons may not increase the appropriations above the estimates. They may, however, diminish or strike out any item. The Lords may strike out any item, though this privilege is theoretical rather than practical.

The French method, which has been much criticised in France and elsewhere, intrusts the budget made up by the ministers to a committee of thirty-three, three from each of eleven groups selected by lot. This committee frames appropriation bills independently of the minister of finance and the cabinet, and even assumes the right to change established law. The budget, after passing the Chamber of Deputies, where it is almost always increased, goes to the Senate, where a policy of greater conservatism prevails. No additions are common in the latter body except to provide for activities or expenses of the Government in pursuance of law which the Chamber of Deputies has stricken out.

In 1876 the Chamber denied the right of the Senate to introduce a new proposition in financial legislation, only conceding the right to reduce or reject altogether. After a lengthy controversy the Chamber yielded the point, but did not concede the right. M. Gambetta, in a plan for the revision of the constitution, advocated giving the Chamber of Deputies the final word on finance, restricting that body, however, so that it would not have power to increase any estimate which came from the minister.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman, for my information, how do they ascertain the aggregate in the British House of Commons until each separate department has been investigated to ascertain what are the necessities of that particular department?

Mr. BURTON. Each particular department carefully makes up its list.

Mr. GILBERT. Of the sum total of these items?

Mr. BURTON. They are then submitted to the chancellor of the exchequer, and carefully considered, and where an item is regarded as extravagant it is sent back to the particular department for its consideration, and then the bill is brought before the House of Commons as stated.

I have before me a comparative statement of the receipts and expenditures of the United States for the eight months ending February, 1904. It appears that the total expenses have been $360,000,000, and the total receipts $365,000,000, an excess of receipts of $5,000,000. In the preceding year, for the eight months ending February, 1903, the total expenditures were $344,000,000 and the receipts $377,000,000. Comparing these two years, there was a surplus of $33,000,000 for the eight months of the fiscal year of 1903 and of only $5,000,000 for the eight months of 1904. The receipts of 1903 were $12,000,000 more and the expenditures $16,000,000 less.

There is no occasion for any note of alarm from these figures, but words of caution are not out of place. It is a question whether it would not have been better for us in the years that are passed to have kept down the revenues, thereby maintaining more nearly a balance between revenues and expenditures and doing away with the temptation to extravagance, but these figures bring to our minds the thought that other sources of revenue may be necessary.

A possible danger is apparent here in the absence of any ready provision for flexibility in the amount of revenue. The receipts from established sources change year by year, and they may not rise or fall with the appropriations which are voted. It has been suggested that the Committee on Ways and Means might be charged with the responsibility of supervising all appropriations, criticising such as seem to be objectionable, and opposing or favoring liberal appropriations according to the conditions of the time. It may be desirable for that committee also to consider the subject of prompter provision for changes in the amount of revenue which can be collected. Frequent changes in revenue laws are regarded in this country with distrust and reluctance because of their close interrelation with business conditions. At the same time the ability to increase or decrease revenue according to existing needs is part of a well-adjusted system of finance.

With a view to meeting unexpected deficiencies the act of June 13, 1898, gave authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certificates of indebtedness, an equivalent of exchequer bills, to an amount not exceeding $100,000,000, payable not exceeding one year from date. It is especially desirable, however, that this method should not be resorted to.

One other feature of our appropriations which is worthy of notice is the very considerable amount of permanent annual appropriations which are paid out of the Treasury without any legislative act. The amount is perhaps one-fifth or one-sixth of the total. They are of the same character as the so-called "consolidated fund" in Great Britain. There are arguments for and against this method of meeting certain kinds of expenses. The argument for permanent annual appropriations is that they give a greater stability to the operations of the Government, that the different undertakings may be carried on and executed without impediment or delay.

Then there is the argument derived from the amount of time consumed in considering these permanent annual charges. It is said that just in proportion as you devote time and pains to examining items which are fixed and necessary, in the same proportion you diminish the care which will be given to those which are mutable and change from year to year. As illustrations, we know the constitutional provision in regard to the Army. Appropriations can not be made for it for more than two years. On the other hand, it is rational to provide for the sinking fund by a permanent annual appropriation. The same is true of the interest upon the public debt. Neither should require annually recurring legislative action. But it must be said on the other side that this custom of expending large amounts, aggregating now, I think, about $100,000,000 or more, without any action by Congress is not in accordance with the most advanced ideas of republican government.

In a report filed in this House in 1893 one hundred and eighty-five different objects were specified for which permanent annual provision was made without any action of Congress.

There is a very manifest incongruity which exists. The expenses of collecting the customs revenue are paid from a permanent appropriation. Those for collecting the internal revenue are annually provided by a bill of Congress. It would seem that there is no reason for this distinction between the two.

In concluding, gentlemen, I desire to say that there is no occasion to indulge in any spirit of pessimism from an account of our financial condition. In the year 1860 about $56,000,000 of revenue was raised. In the year 1866 the amount had then increased, I think, to nearly ten times as much—to about $560,000,000. No nation ever made such a showing as that. I have the exact figures before me, which will be more satisfactory. In the year 1860 the revenue was $56,000,000. With the depleted receipts of 1861 it was only $41,500,000. In 1866 it was $558,000,000, very nearly ten times as great as in 1860. Nothing comparable to that can be found in the history of the world's finances. Industries were flourishing and commerce was making great strides, notwithstanding the absence of millions of men engaged in bloody strife, and when the great armies were disbanded and turned from war back to peace all found immediate employment. That is an illustration of the unsurpassed financial strength and possibilities of this country.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. You stated the amount as collected in 1860; was that not upon a metallic currency, upon a gold and silver basis?

Mr. BURTON. I understand so.

Mr. SIMS. And in 1866 it was upon a paper basis?

Mr. BURTON. It was upon a paper basis, and I should have stated that. I do not recollect the exact premium upon gold. It was perhaps from 20 to 25 per cent in 1866.[a]

The problems of national expenditure in the United States pertain to a country boundless in resources, of almost inconceivable variety, with an ever-widening market in which its position as the chief purveyor of the world's wants is becoming more and more assured, a people ready and patriotic in responding to demands for increased taxation, whose Secretaries of the Treasury, unlike finance ministers of other countries, have been subjected to anxiety not to provide for deficits, but to dispose of surpluses. With all these conditions, there may be confidence that no reasonable expenditure need be curtailed.

But at the same time the greatest caution should be exercised against extravagance. The consideration of the nation's finances is worthy to be ranked with the aspirations of patriotism and every form of national advancement, for wisdom or failure there will bring blessing or misfortune to the whole people. [Great applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I desire unanimous consent to enlarge and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The following is in extension of Mr. BURTON'S remarks:

a Figures not accessible. b Crowns; 2 crowns equal 1 florin.

From 1880 to 1892 the monetary unit was a silver florin. The value of the florin as here shown is taken from the report of the Director of the United States Mint. Conversions have been made into United States money, but it is very doubtful if the figures as given in United States money show the relative condition of the several annual budgets as they really affected the Austro-Hungarian Empire. The florin was probably worth more in circulation within the country than its commercial value abroad. The amounts as given in United States money from 1880 to 1892 should be used with great caution, if at all. The gold standard was adopted in August, 1892, since which time it is believed the conversion as shown can be safely accepted.

The budget is reported in paper rubles in the Statesman's Year Book. The same source gives the value of the paper ruble in English money. The valuation as given in English money has been converted into United States money. Using this valuation, the budget has been converted into United States money. There may be small inaccuracies in the years 1895 to 1899, but the figures can be considered approximately correct.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield forty minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, on frequent occasions during this session the House has been entertained with eloquent dissertations upon the unprecedented and universal prosperity of the people of the United States.

Whenever reference has been made on this side of the Chamber to the iniquitous protective-tariff law on our statute books, it has invariably provoked some distinguished statesman on that side to refresh and revive our drooping spirits with an impassioned panegyric on national prosperity.

The Dingley tariff, it is earnestly contended, is the pure fountain from which all national blessings flow, and the argument in support of this contention is rank, illogical, unwarrantable assumption on the part of the advocates of protection.

We are told unblushingly and with apparent candor, in effect, that whatever of happiness and prosperity is enjoyed by the eighty-odd million American citizens is traceable largely, if not entirely, to the salutary and beneficent influences of a tariff for protection.

They arrogantly tell us that under and by reason of this policy which we denounce as pernicious and fraught with so much of hardship and oppression to the masses, that labor has found permanent and remunerative employment, that higher wages have been secured to the workingman, and that the distribution of wealth is just and equitable.

No one will contend that present conditions are as bad as they were a few years ago. On the contrary, it is exceedingly gratifying to be able to state that conditions to-day are improved and the people are happier and apparently more prosperous than they were in the recent past. But I deny that the prosperity of the masses to-day is in any wise or to any extent the result of Republican solicitude for public welfare or of Republican legislation. It is the natural and logical result of conditions which the Republican party can neither influence nor control, and comes to the people, not by reason of the odious robber tariff, but in spite of it.

The small measure of prosperity we witness to-day may or may not be permanent. I am no pessimist, but, Mr. Chairman, if the people of the United States are ambitious to be free in the full sense of the word, and if they indulge the fond hope that they may some time live in free homes and be permitted to enjoy the fruits of their toil, I confidently believe and shall attempt to show they can only reach the goal of their ambition and enjoy a realization of their hopes by a complete victory and triumph over the party in power and the repudiation of all it stands for.

For forty years we have been burdened, oppressed, and cursed with the cruel imposition and heartless exactions of protective laws enacted to foster, encourage, and promote the interests of American industries. During this long period of protection the manufacturers have contributed only 19.67 per cent of the vast total volume of our domestic exports, while those engaged in agricultural pursuits have contributed the enormous proportion of 73.50 per cent, or nearly three-fourths of the entire domestic export trade of the United States.

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I will read and insert in my remarks an extract from the last report of the Secretary of Agriculture:

THE FARMERS' BALANCE OF TRADE.

The immense exports from the farms of the country lead to an examination of the so-called "balance of trade." This examination reveals what seems to have escaped the attention of the public, and that is that the favorable balance of trade, everything included, is due to the still more favorable balance of trade in the products of the farm.

During the thirteen years 1890-1902 the average annual excess of domestic exports over imports amounted to $275,000,000, and during the same time the annual average in favor of farm products was $637,000,000, from which it is apparent that there was an average annual adverse balance of trade in products other than those of the farm amounting to $362,000,000, which the farmers offset and had left $275,000,000 to the credit of themselves and the country.

Taking the business of 1903, the comparison is much more favorable to the farmers than during the preceding thirteen-year period, since the value of domestic exports over imports was $367,000,000, the entire trade being included, while the excess for farm products was $422,000,000, which was sufficient not only to offset the unfavorable balance of trade of $55,000,000 in products other than those of the farm, but to leave, as above stated, the enormous favorable balance of $367,000,000.

During the last fourteen years there was a balance of trade in favor of farm products, without excepting any year, that amounted to $4,809,000,000. Against this was an adverse balance of trade in products other than those of the farm of $865,000,000, and the farmers not only canceled this immense obligation, but had enough left to place $3,940,000,000 to the credit of the nation when the books of international exchange were balanced.

These figures tersely express the immense national reserve-sustaining power of the farmers of the country under present quantities of production. It is the farmers who have paid the foreign bondholders.

In view of this splendid contribution to foreign commerce, in addition to supplying domestic demands, so clearly and fully stated by Secretary Wilson, the farmers of the United States, under fair, just, and equitable laws, ought to be the happiest, most prosperous, and the most independent people on the face of the earth. But, Mr. Chairman, that great army of wealth producers, the 10,381,765 men of brawn and muscle engaged in agriculture, are being ruthlessly and shamelessly pillaged and robbed. They are the victims of inordinate greed and avarice. The discriminations against them in the Dingley tariff act are so conspicuous and flagrant that its revision is now demanded by thoughtful men who are fair in all political parties.

In response to the demand for revision, which, like Banquo's ghost, "will not down at your bidding," party leaders are wont to tell us that in their own good time, when the spirit moves them just right, they will make necessary revision without Democratic aid or participation. This means, if it means anything except a deliberate purpose to further deceive the people, that they will administer such soothing and painless remedies as the beneficiaries of this infamous system of legalized robbery are quite sure will do them no harm and afford the people no relief.

If you are in good faith why don't you proceed to revise, and begin now? [Applause on the Democratic side.] The people are appealing to you, and the privileged class, the tariff and its offspring—the trusts—have a strong majority on this floor and the largest majority they will ever have in the White House. [Laughter and applause.]

Are the people mistaken or are they so very prosperous that your infallible judgment, exalted patriotism, and wise statesmanship lead your impartial minds to honestly conclude that it is best to keep on letting "well enough" alone? How long will conditions continue to be "well enough?"

The unexpected and phenomenal production of gold and its largely increased coinage in recent years, together with a magnificent balance of trade in our favor, have contributed to raise the per capita of circulation from $21.44 in 1896 to $30.75 on the 1st day of this month, an increase of nearly 50 per cent, and inevitably this great increase in the volume of money in circulation and the bounteous harvest with which we have been blessed have produced better times temporarily, at least.

But statistics of the last ten years demonstrate to my mind, reluctant as I am to accept them, that the masses are not enjoying real, lasting prosperity.

The census returns show that the mortgage indebtedness of the people of the United States between 1890 and 1900 increased 39.48 per cent; that during the same period the number of mortgaged homes increased 39.11 per cent. They also show that during this period of ten years the percentage of families owning free homes decreased 2.6 per cent, while those owning mortgaged homes increased 1.3 per cent and those living in rented homes increased 1.3 per cent.

In this connection I desire to read in support of my statements a table I have prepared from information furnished by the Census Bureau and obtained from the Abstract of the Twelfth Census.

	1890.	1900.	Per cent of increase.
Mortgage indebtedness in the United States	$6,019,679,985	$8,394,728,733	39.48
Number of mortgaged homes in the United States	1,696,890	2,361,606	39.11
Per cent of families in the United States having homes:
Owned free	34.4	31.8	----------
Owned mortgaged	13.4	14.7	----------
Rented	52.2	53.5	----------

These statistics do not inspire or justify the assumption of universal prosperity so eloquently declaimed by gentlemen on the other side. On the contrary, however much we may lament it, they force upon us a sad and unhappy realization of the truth that we are fast ceasing to be a nation of home owners.

The mortgage indebtedness of the United States has increased in ten years at an alarming and prodigious rate—nearly 40 per cent—and the number of mortgaged homes has increased over 39 per cent. This is Republican high-protection prosperity—a kind of prosperity that enables its relentless and merciless creature, the trust, to fasten its poisonous fangs in the homes of the people, and when the unfortunate victim can no longer respond to unreasonable, harsh, and extortionate demands, then to drive him from the old homestead to become a tenant.

In a speech on this floor last December that great party leader, the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], said:

> I live in a county of 24,000 people—a farming community. On the 1st day of last October there were $2,580,000 of deposits in the little banks of that county—more than a hundred dollars for every man, woman, and child in the county.

This is a splendid showing for Page County, Iowa, the home of the most influential and powerful advocate of high protection on this floor. But of course his people—his immediate neighbors and close personal friends, citizens of his county and of his State—have prospered under a tariff for protection, or this gallant and fearless Representative would not indorse protection.

The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] after hearing the great speech of the gentleman from Iowa in support of the protective tariff policy of the Republican party, said:

> I do not intend to mar the beauty, the symmetry, and irresistible logic of the gentleman from Iowa.

We may assume that the good people of Athens County, Ohio, are prosperous, too, or surely the great leader from Ohio would not concede the "irresistible logic" of an argument in support of the Dingley tariff.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit some statistics, which I shall incorporate in my remarks, showing the mortgage indebtedness and the number of homes mortgaged in Iowa and Ohio, two of the leading agricultural States of the Union.

	Mortgage indebtedness.		Increased indebtedness.	Per cent of increase.
	1890.	1900.
Iowa	$199,774,171	$217,040,258	$17,266,087	8.64
Ohio	259,842,188	325,898,374	66,056,186	25.42
Page County, Iowa	1,989,992	2,113,264	123,272	6.19
Athens County, Ohio	4,333,581	5,176,792	843,211	19.46

	Number of homes mortgaged.		Increased number of homes mortgaged.	Per cent of increase.
	1890.	1900.
Iowa	104,072	118,173	14,101	13.55
Ohio	123,423	158,355	34,932	28.30
Page County, Iowa	1,166	1,471	305	26.16
Athens County, Ohio	913	1,120	207	22.67

These figures, which are carefully compiled from data furnished by the Census Bureau, show that under the operation of this so-called wise and beneficial policy of the Republican party the mortgage indebtedness of Iowa, that stalwart Republican State, has increased 8.64 per cent and the number of mortgaged homes has increased 13.55 per cent in ten years.

In Ohio the increase of mortgage indebtedness from 1890 to 1900 is 25.42 per cent and of mortgaged homes 28.30 per cent.

This is not all. In Page County, Iowa, where we are told the bank deposits equal $100 per capita, these statistics prove that for every dollar deposited in 1903 by the more fortunate there was a like sum in 1900 plastered upon the homes of the people. To be entirely accurate, statistics show that in 1900 there was secured by mortgage—not chattel mortgage, municipal or corporate indebtedness, but by deeds of trusts upon homes of the people of Page County, Iowa—a sum equal to $87.40 for each and every man, woman, and child in that county. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In Athens County, Ohio, the home of the chief idolater of high tariff, mortgage indebtedness has increased 19.46 per cent and the number of mortgaged homes 22.67 per cent in ten years. These are additional evidences of the wholesome and highly beneficial results of so-called protection. Iowa and Ohio are great agricultural States, and under normal conditions the people ought to prosper. But the blight of tariff for protection falls upon producers everywhere, and, insidiously, day by day steals the fruits of labor to fill the coffers of those who reap where they have not sown. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Col. J. H. Brigham, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, in an interview published in the Washington Post recently, used this language:

> It is very well understood by intelligent farmers that trade conditions now existing do not secure to the farmer the full share of the value of his products that rightfully belong to him. They also know that existing combinations compel the farmer to pay more than is equitable for the implements with which he tills the soil and the supplies of the farm and home. It is also well understood that the farmer bears more than his full share of the burden of taxation.

Thus, with great precision and accuracy, speaks one high in authority, whose official duties require him to study the condition of those engaged in agricultural pursuits. Why, in the name of common decency and of all that is right and fair, should "trade conditions" be sacredly preserved and long continued which rob the farmer of part "of the value of his products that rightfully belongs to him?"

What justification can a great political party urge for willfully, knowingly, and deliberately compelling the farmers of the United States to pay "more than their full share of the burden of taxation?"

These are vital questions which you, my Republican friends, will soon be called upon to answer, and I predict your attempted answer, like Macbeth's "Amen," will "stick in your throats." Your siren song of prosperity, with which you have gained and held public confidence, won't always avail you. A day of reckoning is approaching, and, in my judgment, the time is not remote when the "intelligent farmers" of the United States will arise in their might and, as a reasonable and richly merited punishment for your many sins and transgressions, will banish you from political place and power forever. [Applause on the Democratic side].

Mr. Chairman, I have also compiled some statistics of two great manufacturing States—Massachusetts and Connecticut—which I will put in the RECORD:

	1890.	1900.	Per cent of increase.
Mortgage indebtedness:
Massachusetts	$323,277,668	$498,780,877	54.29
Connecticut	$79,921,071	$109,298,055	36.76
Number of homes mortgaged:
Massachusetts	66,249	101,809	53.68
Connecticut	28,518	38,991	36.72

This table proves that even in States where protected industries thrive and prosper the masses are not prosperous. In Massachusetts the mortgage indebtedness increased 54.29 per cent and the number of homes mortgaged increased 53.68 per cent, and in Connecticut mortgage indebtedness increased 36.76 per cent and the number of homes mortgaged increased 36.74 per cent in ten years.

But note in comparison what the tariff is doing for protected industries. While wage-earners and farmers are oppressed and burdened and debts are rapidly increasing upon their homes, protected enterprises of all kinds are growing fabulously rich.

I shall insert as part of my remarks this table, giving a summary of manufactures in Massachusetts and Connecticut.

Summary of manufactures.

	1880.	1890.	1900.
CONNECTICUT.
Number of establishments	4,488	6,822	9,128
Capital	$120,480,275	$227,004,496	$314,696,736
Total wages	43,501,518	66,465,317	82,767,725
Cost of materials	102,183,341	123,183,080	185,641,219
Value of products	185,697,211	248,336,364	352,824,106
Net profits above cost of materials and labor	40,012,352	58,687,967	84,415,162
MASSACHUSETTS.
Number of establishments	14,352	26,923	29,180
Capital	$393,806,185	$630,032,341	$823,264,287
Total wages	128,315,362	205,844,337	228,240,442
Cost of materials	386,972,655	473,199,434	552,717,955
Value of products	631,135,284	888,160,403	1,035,198,989
Net profits above cost of materials and labor	115,847,267	209,116,632	254,240,592

Here it is shown that each and every one of the protected industries in these States makes an average annual profit over and above the total cost of labor and materials of about $9,000,000.

In Connecticut the 9,128 concerns made in 1900 above the cost of labor and materials $84,415,162, and in Massachusetts the 29,160 establishments cleared the colossal sum of $254,240,592.

But we hear the argument that a protective tariff aids labor in securing permanent and profitable employment.

I will now read and insert in the RECORD a table found in the Abstract of the Twelfth Census, from which we may discover what great things protection has done for labor.

Comparative summary, 1890 to 1900, Twelfth Census.

	Date of census.		Per cent of increase, 1890 to 1900.
	1900.	1890.
Number of establishments	512,276	355,405	44.1
Capital	$9,831,486,500	$6,525,050,759	50.7
Salaried officials, clerks, etc., number	397,092	461,001	13.9
Salaries	$404,112,794	$391,984,660	3.1
Wage-earners, average number	5,314,539	4,251,535	25.0
Total wages	$2,327,295,545	$1,891,209,696	23.1
Men, at least 16 years of age	4,114,348	3,326,964	23.7
Wages	$2,019,954,204	$1,659,215,858	21.7
Women, at least 16 years of age	1,031,608	803,686	28.4
Wages	$281,679,649	$215,367,976	30.8
Children, under 16 years	168,583	120,885	39.5
Wages	$25,661,692	$16,625,862	54.3
Miscellaneous expenses	$1,027,865,277	$631,219,783	62.8
Cost of materials used	$7,346,358,979	$5,162,013,878	42.3
Value of products, including custom work and repairing	$13,010,036,514	$9,372,378,843	38.8

These are the latest official figures, and they make it plain that from 1890 to 1900 capital employed in manufacture increased 50 per cent, the value of products increased 38.8 per cent, while the number of wage-earners only increased 25 per cent. This table also shows that with a 25 per cent increase in the number of laborers there was only a 23 per cent increase in total wages paid—a direct reduction of 2 per cent of the wage of every man who earns his bread by the sweat of his brow. It also shows that in 1900 the number of "women at least 16 years of age" who were compelled to delve and toil in workshops for food and raiment was 28.4 per cent more than in 1890.

This is not all. Shameful as it is, unwelcome as the truth may be, statistics show that the number of "children under 16 years of age"—little boys and girls—who are driven by necessity to work for bread has increased 39.5 per cent in ten years, and this, too, in an era of unequaled and unrivaled prosperity.

I warn you—you who espouse the doctrine of protection—that you will not be allowed to escape responsibility for conditions which force "children under 16 years of age" into the great sweat shops of the country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Yes; Republican tariff for protection does find employment for labor—the labor of women and children. You breed and nurture and shelter a rapacious, remorseless, ill-shapen monster, politely called the "trusts." This hideous monster, the handiwork of genius inspired and directed by the devil, not content with the huge drops of sweat wrung from the brow of every son of toil who has reached manhood's estate, in fiendish glee demands for its insatiate appetite the sacrifice of the time and labor of women and children. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I challenge the Republican party to present any good, logical, or satisfactory reason, excuse, or justification for its tenacious support of a policy which enables the protected industries of the United States to compel American consumers to pay higher prices for their goods and wares than they ask and receive for the same products in foreign markets. Yet this is one of the baneful results of your damnable policy of protection. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Farmers and wage-earners, being forced to buy in markets where protection has strangled and murdered competition, are helpless victims of the greed and rapacity of conscienceless and heartless scoundrels whose wholesale robbery is sanctioned by law.

The American Machinist of September 26, 1889, said:

Just why American manufacturers will sell machinery and other goods from 10 to 30 per cent cheaper in Europe than they will sell them to be used at home is rather puzzling, but anyone curious in the matter can easily enough find out that many of them do that.

Mr. A. B. Farquhar, in a letter to the Farmers' Call, of Quincy, Ill., on July 30, 1890, said:

The fact is that our protective laws are a monstrous swindle upon the agricultural community. But, as I have explained, the farmer is being destroyed.

In May, 1901, Mr. Charles M. Schwab, then president of the steel trust, testifying before the Industrial Commission, said:

It is quite true that export prices are made at a very much lower rate than those here.

In Mr. Schwab's testimony this question and answer appear:

Q. Is it a fact, generally true of all exporters in this country, that they do sell at lower prices in foreign markets than they do in the home market?—A. That is true; perfectly true.

Mr. Chairman, I will include in my remarks a short table, published in 1890 in a pamphlet entitled "Protection's Home Market," which shows the difference, at that time, in domestic and foreign wholesale prices of a few articles of common use:

Article.	Domestic price.	Foreign price.
Cultivators	$11.00	$8.40
Plows	14.00	12.60
Axes, per dozen	8.25	7.20
Kettles	1.40	.85
Wire nails, per 100 pounds	2.25	1.35
Table knives, per gross	15.00	12.00
Horse nails, per pound	.17	.14
Barbed wire, per 100 pounds	3.00	2.60
Rivets, per 100 pounds	10.00	5.55
Typewriters	100.00	60.00
Sewing machines:
Fine	27.50	20.75
Medium	22.00	17.50
Cheap	18.00	12.00

In the light of these and other available statistics, all emanating from Republican sources, I am surprised, amazed, and astounded at the temerity of gentlemen who still argue that a protective tariff is conducive to the welfare of the people. It occurs to me that a man who has the hardihood to face his constituents and plead with them to cleave to the delusive hope of protection for the good it has done or that it may do in carrying blessings into the homes of the masses must have cheek of such gigantic proportions that a whole buffalo robe wouldn't make side whiskers for him. [Laughter.]

A few days ago we were derisively asked, "What does the Democratic party stand for?"

The old party stands, as it has always stood, for equal rights to all and special privileges to none. It stands for that great true principle, once of universal acceptation, that "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." It stands as the proud champion of the oppressed wage-earner and producer, resisting further encroachment of organized wealth, the tariff worshipers, the trusts, the devil, and the Republican party. It stands for revision of the tariff, without hostile intent to any legitimate business, but with an unalterable purpose, if intrusted with power, to perform its duty though the combined trusts in the United States should perish in less time than it took the President to produce abortion in Colombia and deliver the infant Republic of Panama. [Laughter and applause.]

The Democratic party stands on tiptoe of expectancy, looking with hopeful eye into the near future, confidently believing the "intelligent farmers" and wage-earners of the United States have discovered the emptiness and barrenness of Republican promises and the utter insincerity of the party, and that they will, in next November, tear from you the robes of hypocrisy and "put in every honest hand a whip to lash the 'G. O. P.' naked through the world, even from the East to the West." [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, labor legislation interests men of all conditions. It often is subjected to the harshest and most unmerited criticism. There are many who are unable to discuss measures intended to benefit the condition of the laborer or mechanic without resort to language of the most intemperate character. There is a mistaken but very prevalent belief that all legislation proposed for the betterment of labor is in reality a covert attack upon capital. In economics labor is not antagonistic to capital, nor are the interests of capital contrary to those of labor. Both are essential to all true progress. Each has its part, its rights, its privileges, and if those rights and privileges were always respected and ever regulated by the eternal principles of justice there would be no conflict of interest.

It is unfortunately true, however, that from time immemorial labor has been compelled to combine and to struggle vigorously for its own protection; and legislation has been imperative to eradicate and to prevent abuses which, if permitted to continue, would seriously menace the welfare of society.

LABOR LEGISLATION IN NEW YORK.

The State of New York, like most other States of the Union, has from time to time enacted what are known as "labor laws," and it is my purpose at this time briefly to discuss some features of them in connection with certain decisions of the New York court of appeals.

In 1897 the legislature passed what is known as the "Labor law." It is chapter 415 of the laws of 1897 and is entitled "An act in relation to labor, constituting chapter 32 of the general laws." Pursuing the policy initiated some years previously of codifying the general laws of the State, this act was intended as, and in fact was, a codification of the general laws affecting labor. Embraced within it are the salient features of fifty laws, which had been enacted at different times, commencing in 1870. The comprehensiveness of the act is apparent from a partial enumeration of the subjects contained therein. It defines a legal day's work; it regulates the wages on public works, the number of hours that constitute a day's work in various industries, and the method of paying wages to employees in certain employments; it provides for the preference in employment of certain persons in public works; it recognizes and protects labels, brands, and devices used by labor organizations; it has provisions for the safety and comfort of employees in factories, upon scaffolding, and on buildings in cities.

By its terms a commission of labor statistics and free public employment bureaus are created, as well as a board of arbitration; and it includes many other beneficial provisions, among which may be specially mentioned those for the protection of minors and of women employed in factories. While there might well be an honest difference regarding some provisions of the law, yet a condition that compelled a State to enact that—

No person or corporation operating a line of railroad of 30 miles in length or over, in whole or in part within this State, shall permit or require a conductor, engineer, fireman, or trainman, who has worked in any capacity for twenty-four consecutive hours, to go again on duty or perform any kind of work, until he has had at least eight hours' rest—should be sufficient justification, without elaborate argument, to convince humane men that gross abuses existed in the industrial world which could be eradicated only by legislation.

PREVAILING RATE OF WAGES AND EIGHT-HOUR PROVISION.

The provision of the law which has given rise, perhaps, to the greatest controversy, both in and out of the courts, is section 3 of the act. As amended by chapter 567 of the laws of 1899, the section is as follows:

Hours to constitute a day's work: Eight hours shall constitute a legal day's work for all classes of employees in this State, except those engaged in farm and domestic service, unless otherwise provided by law. This section does not prevent an agreement for overwork at an increased compensation, except upon work by or for a municipal corporation or by contractors or subcontractors therewith. Each contract to which the State or a municipal corporation is a party which may involve the employment of laborers, workmen, or mechanics shall contain a stipulation that no laborer, workman, or mechanic in the employ of the contractor or subcontractor or other person doing or contracting to do the whole or a part of the work contemplated by the contract shall be permitted or required to work more than eight hours in any one calendar day, except in cases of extraordinary emergency caused by fire, flood, or danger to life or property. The wages to be paid for a legal day's work, as hereinbefore defined, to all classes of such laborers, workmen, or mechanics upon all such public work or upon any material to be used in connection therewith shall not be less than the prevailing rate for a day's work in the same trade or occupation in the locality within the State where such public work on, about, or in connection with which such labor is performed in its final or completed form is to be situated, erected, or used.

Each such contract hereafter made shall contain a stipulation that each such laborer, workman, or mechanic employed by such contractor, subcontractor, or other person on, about, or upon such public work shall receive such wages herein provided for. Each contract for such public work hereafter made shall contain a provision that the same shall be void and of no effect unless the person or corporation making or performing the same shall comply with the provisions of this section; and no such person or corporation shall be entitled to receive any sum, nor shall any officer, agent, or employee of the State or of a municipal corporation pay the same or authorize its payment from the funds under his charge or control to any such person or corporation for work done upon any contract which in its form or manner of performance violates the provisions of this section.

This section is given at length because it has been the subject of such controversy, and has been passed upon in two cases in the court of appeals. It seeks not alone to prescribe the length of a legal day's work, but it requires the payment of the prevailing, or going, wages upon public works. Its provisions are most drastic, not only forfeiting the contractor's rights for a violation of the provisions of this law, but absolutely prohibiting a State or municipal officer making payment upon a contract for public work which has not been performed in compliance with the provisions of the law. It is often referred to as the "eight-hour law," and frequently as "the prevailing rate of wages law."

PREVAILING RATE OF WAGES PROVISION UNCONSTITUTIONAL IN PART.

The section first came before the court of appeals for review in the Rodgers case (166 N. Y., 1).

That was an appeal from the appellate division of the supreme court in the first department, which reversed an order of the special term denying the relator's application for a peremptory writ of mandamus commanding the comptroller of the city of New York to deliver a warrant on the chamberlain for the amount due upon a contract for grading a certain street, and granting the application.

The contract made with the city of New York contained, in addition to the clauses usual in such contracts, a provision that the contractor would pay his workmen not less than the prevailing rate of wages in the locality, as required by the provision of the labor law just read. The contract was completed, all conditions requisite to the issuing of a warrant fulfilled by the relator, but the comptroller of the city refused to deliver a warrant for the amount due because the contractor had not in all cases paid the prevailing rate of wages to his employees.

The court of appeals held the labor law, so far as it relates to such a case, to be unconstitutional for the following reasons, as stated in the syllabus: First, because in its actual operation it permits and requires the expenditure of the money of the city or that of the local property owner for other than city purposes. Second, because it invades rights of liberty and property in that it denies to the city and the contractor the right to agree with their employees upon the measure of their compensation and compels them in all cases to pay an arbitrary and uniform rate which is expressed in vague language, difficult to define or ascertain and subject to constant change from artificial causes. Third, because it virtually confiscates all property rights of the contractor under his contract for breach of his engagement to obey the statute, and attempts to make acts and commissions penal which in themselves are innocent and harmless, and in effect imposes a penalty for the exercise of the right to agree with employees upon the terms and conditions of employment.

The court was not unanimous in its decision. A vigorous dissenting opinion was read by Chief Judge Parker (see Appendix A) and one also by Judge Haight, in which the law was defended as a proper exercise of legislative power, and the contentions of the majority on all points strongly combated.

DIRECT EMPLOYEES OF STATE OR MUNICIPALITY ENTITLED TO PREVAILING RATE OF WAGES.

This is peculiarly interesting since the decision in the case of Ryan v. City of New York (177 N. Y., 271), handed down on January 24, 1904. In that case it is held that the "prevailing rate of wages" provision of the labor law, so far as it relates to the direct employees of the State or of a municipality thereof, is constitutional. So that, as a result of these decisions of the court of appeals, employees of the State or of municipalities upon public works must be paid the "prevailing rate of wages," while those employed under contract on such works need not be so paid.

In the Rodgers case the prevailing opinion was written by Judge O'Brien and dissenting opinions by Judges Parker and Haight, while in the Ryan case the prevailing opinion is written by Judge Parker and Judge O'Brien writes in dissent. (See opinion of Parker, J., in Appendix B.)

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT FOLLOWS JUDGE PARKER.

Judge Parker, in his opinion in the Ryan case, cites the case of Aiken v. State of Kansas (191 U. S., 207), which upholds a statute of Kansas providing that eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, mechanics, or other persons now employed, or who may hereafter be employed, by or on behalf of Kansas, or by or on behalf of any county, city, township, or other municipality of said State. Not less than the current rate of per diem wages in the locality where the work is performed shall be paid to laborers, workmen, mechanics, and other persons employed by or on behalf of the State of Kansas, or any county, city, township, or other municipality of said State. All contracts hereafter made by or on behalf of any county, city, township, or other municipality of said State, with any corporation, person, or persons, for the performance of any work, or the furnishing of any material manufactured within the State of Kansas, shall be deemed and considered as made upon the basis of eight hours constituting a day's work. I now quote from the language used by Judge Parker:

A violation of the statute is a misdemeanor. (Referring to the Kansas statute.) Atkin made a contract with a municipality—Kansas City—to pave a street. He was convicted under the statute and the conviction affirmed by the Kansas supreme court. It was argued before the United States Supreme Court that the statute violates the fourteenth amendment in that it deprives the contractor of his liberty and property without due process of law, and denies him the equal protection of the laws. The court holds that the statute does not violate the fourteenth amendment, and in the course of the opinion, written by Mr. Justice Harlan, says:

"If a statute," counsel observes, "such as the one under consideration is justifiable, should it not apply to all persons and to all vocations whatsoever? Why should such a law be limited to contractors with the State and its municipalities? Why should the law allow a contractor to agree with a laborer to shovel dirt for ten hours in a day in performance of a private contract and make exactly the same act, under similar conditions, a misdemeanor when done in performance of a contract for the construction of a public improvement? Why is liberty with reference to contracting restricted in one case and not in the other?"

These questions—indeed, the entire argument of defendant's counsel—seem to attach too little consequence to the relation existing between a State and its municipal corporations. Such corporations are the creatures, mere political subdivisions, of the State for the purpose of exercising a part of its powers. They may exert only such powers as are expressly granted to them or such as may be necessarily implied from those granted. What they lawfully do of a public character is done under the sanction of the State. They are, in every essential sense, only auxiliaries of the State for the purposes of local government.

They may be created or, having been created, their powers may be restricted or enlarged or altogether withdrawn at the will of the legislature, the authority of the legislature, when restricting or withdrawing such powers, being subject only to the fundamental condition that the collective and individual rights of the people of the municipality shall not thereby be destroyed. [Citing cases.] In the last cases cited we said that a municipal corporation is, so far as its purely municipal relations are concerned, simply an agency of the State for conducting the affairs of government, and as such it is subject to the control of the legislature.

The court quotes with approval from the opinion in City of Clinton v. Cedar Rapids and Missouri River Railroad Company (24 Iowa, 455, 475): "Municipal corporations owe their origin to, and derive their powers and rights wholly from, the legislatures. It breathes into them the breath of life, without which they can not exist. As it creates, so it may destroy. If it may destroy, it may abridge and control. Unless there is some constitutional limitation on the right, the legislature might, by a single act, if we can suppose it capable of so great a folly and so great a wrong, sweep from existence all municipal corporations in the State, and the corporations could not prevent it. We know of no limitation upon this right, so far as the corporations themselves are concerned. They are, so to phrase it, the mere tenants at will of the legislature."

After referring to the possible motive of the legislature in making the statute, the court continued: "We have no occasion here to consider these questions or to determine upon which side is the sounder reason, for whatever may have been the motives controlling the enactment of the statute in question we can imagine no possible ground to dispute the power of the State to declare that no one undertaking work for it or for one of its municipal agencies should permit or require an employee on such work to labor in excess of eight hours each day and to inflict punishment upon those who are embraced by such regulations and yet disregard them. It can not be deemed a part of the liberty of any contractor that he be allowed to do public work in any mode he may choose to adopt without regard to the wishes of the State. On the contrary, it belongs to the State, as guardian and trustee for its people and having control of its affairs, to prescribe the conditions upon which it will permit public work to be done on its behalf or on behalf of its municipalities. No court has authority to review its action in that respect. Regulations upon this subject suggest only considerations of public policy, and with such considerations the courts have no concern.

This case fully sustains the contentions urged by Judge Parker in his dissenting opinion in the Rodgers case.

DRESSED-STONE LAW UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

Section 14 of the labor law (chap. 415, Laws 1897) is commonly known as the "dressed-stone law." It provides that "all stone used in State and municipal works, except paving blocks and crushed stone, shall be worked, dressed, and carved within the State." There is also a provision for the insertion in all contracts of a clause that the contractor shall comply with the law in this respect, and for a failure to do so the contract shall be revoked and the State or municipality released from all liability.

This provision of the labor law was passed upon by the court of appeals in a proceeding similar to that in the Rodgers case. The court held (People ex rel. Treat v. Coler, 166 N. Y., 144) that the section was violative of the State constitution, and that so far as it compelled municipalities and contractors to use in the construction of public works only such stone as is cut, carved, or dressed in the State of New York is a regulation of commerce between the States which the legislature has no power to make, and is void under the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. In this case, too, following his opinion in the Rodgers case, Judge Parker dissents, and submits his reasons for holding the law not to be in conflict with the Federal Constitution. (See opinion in Appendix C.)

CONVICT-MADE GOODS.

In many States efforts have been made to prevent convict-made goods being placed on the market in competition with the products of free labor. The necessity of keeping convicts employed, recognized as imperative by all criminologists, has added to the difficulties of a problem not easy of solution. If convicts are employed in industries the products of which can not be utilized by the State, some means must be adopted for disposing of them. There are many who realize how detrimental to free labor it is to have such convict-made goods placed on the markets without restrictions.

The people of New York have been keenly alive to the necessity of restrictive measures to protect free labor from the unpaid convict labor, and so, in the constitutional revision of 1894, incorporated into the organic law of the State the following:

The legislature shall, by law, provide for the occupation and employment of prisoners sentenced to the several State prisons, penitentiaries, jails, and reformatories in the State; and on and after the 1st day of January, in the year 1897, no person in any such prison, penitentiary, jail, or reformatory shall be required or allowed to work, while under sentence thereto, at any trade, industry, or occupation wherein or whereby his work, or the product or profit of his work, shall be farmed out, contracted, given, or sold to any person, firm, association, or corporation. This section shall not be construed to prevent the legislature from providing that convicts may work for, and that the products of their labor may be disposed of to, the State or any political division thereof, or for or to any public institution owned or managed and controlled by the State or any political division thereof. (Const. 1894, art. 3, sec. 29.)

In 1896 the so-called "convict-made goods label act" (chap. 921, Laws 1896) was passed. It required all goods made by convict labor in any penal institution to be labeled "convict made" before being sold or exposed for sale within the State. The law was undoubtedly aimed at convict-made goods of other States, since the products of convict labor of New York could not under the constitutional provision just quoted be placed upon the market. The essential features of this act are now sections 50 to 54 of the labor law, except that in the act of 1896 a provision was added to the penal code (sec. 384b) which made it a misdemeanor to have in possession for the purpose of sale, or offering for sale, any convict-made goods without the brand or label required by law, or to remove or deface any such brand or label.

In People v. Hawkins (157 N. Y., 1) this law was held by the court of appeals to be unconstitutional, because it was an attempt to regulate interstate commerce and thus violative of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. Judges Bartlett and Parker wrote dissenting opinions, insisting that the act was a proper exercise of legislative power. (See opinion of Parker, J., Appendix D.)

The true purpose of the law was tersely stated by Judge Parker in the following language:

This statute neither prohibits nor attempts to prohibit other States or citizens of other States from putting prison-made goods upon our markets, nor does it prohibit our own citizens from buying or selling them; if it did, then, concededly, the statute would be in violation of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution and void; it simply requires that prison-made merchandise shall be so branded that our citizens shall know where the goods they are buying were made.

WHAT CONGRESS MIGHT DO.

There is pending in this House a bill (H. R. 10006) to prevent the use by the various Departments of the Federal Government of convict-made goods. It occurs to me that a wise exercise of the power reposed in Congress would be the enactment of a law that would require all prison-made goods, that enter into interstate commerce or are sold in the Territories and the District of Columbia, to be marked or labeled in such a way as to be readily distinguishable from the products of free labor. Such a law, drafted on the lines of the oleomargarine act, would certainly be constitutional. And surely there is more reason for protecting free labor from competition with unpaid convict labor than there is for protecting the makers of butter at the expense of those engaged in the manufacture of oleomargarine.

THE BAKERS' CASE.

In January of this year (1904) another case of importance and upholding a section of the labor law was decided.

Section 110 of article 8 of the labor law is as follows:

No employee shall be required or permitted to work in a biscuit, bread, or cake bakery or confectionery establishment more than sixty hours in any one week or more than ten hours in one day, unless for the purpose of making a shorter workday on the last day of the week; nor more hours in any one week than will make an average of ten hours per day for the number of days during such week in which such employee shall work.

By subdivision 3, section 3841, of the penal code, a violation of the section is made a misdemeanor.

A conviction under the penal code was upheld by the court of appeals in People v. Lochner. (177 N. Y., 145.) Elaborate opinions upholding the conviction were read by Judges Parker, Gray, and Vann, and dissenting opinions by Judges O'Brien and Bartlett.

The law is upheld on the ground that it is a valid exercise of the police power of the legislature relating to the public health, and therefore does not violate either the State or the Federal constitutions.

The following from the opinion of Judge Parker (see Appendix E) clearly defines the proper attitude for courts to assume in passing upon the constitutionality of legislative acts, as it restrains the court to the sphere intended under our system of government, and it contrasts strongly with the action of the courts in many cases.

The courts—

are frequently confronted with the temptation to substitute their judgment for that of the legislature. A given statute, though plainly within the legislative power, seems so repugnant to a sound public policy as to strongly tempt the court to set aside the statute, instead of waiting, as the spirit of our institutions require, until the people can compel their representatives to repeal the obnoxious statute.

In the early history of this country eminent writers gave expression to the fear that the power of the courts to set aside the enactments of the representatives chosen to legislate for the people would in the end prove a weak point in our governmental system, because of the difficulty of keeping the exercise of such great power within its legitimate bounds.

So far in our judicial history it must be said that the courts have in the main been conservative in passing upon legislation attacked as unconstitutional, but occasionally, and especially when a case is on the border line, it is quite possible that the judgment of the court that the legislation is unwise may operate to carry the decision to the wrong side of that border line. Certain it is that the courts have greatly extended their jurisdiction over many administrative acts that were originally supposed not to present cases for the court to pass upon, and in that way the courts have come to play a very important part in State and municipal administration.

The decisions to which I have called attention have settled many vexed questions that grew out of the enactment of the labor law. In those in which various provisions of the act have been held unconstitutional the people of New York have acquiesced with the same loyalty as in those wherein the law has been upheld. The decisions are important, too, not merely because they determine the law in New York, but by reason of the high esteem in which the court of final resort in New York is held by the courts of other States and the influence its determinations must necessarily have upon the judiciary of the country.

RIGHTS OF LABOR ORGANIZATIONS.

There is one other case to which I desire to call attention. It may be of more interest here on account of certain pending legislation than any already discussed. Certainly it should be carefully weighed by those citizens of my own State who have been so outspoken in condemnation of what are known as the "anti-injunction" and the "anti-conspiracy" bills (H. R. 89, 1234, 4063, and 8136). The case to which I refer is the National Protective Association of Steam Fitters and Helpers et al. v. James M. Cumming et al. (170 N. Y., 315). As in most of the cases in the court of appeals in which labor questions are involved, the court is almost evenly divided in the case, although in no instance has the court in such cases divided on political lines.

This action grew out of a dispute between rival labor organizations. Charles McQueed, a member of the National Protective Association of Steam Fitters and Helpers, a corporation organized under the laws of New York, brought an action on behalf of himself and his fellow-members to restrain the board of delegates and certain individuals, members of the Board of Delegates and of the Enterprise Association of Steam Fitters and of the Progress Association of Steam Fitters and Helpers, from preventing the employment of the plaintiffs and from coercing their discharge by any employer, through threats, strikes, or otherwise, and to recover damages.

The trial court gave judgment restraining defendants from—preventing the work, business, or employment of the plaintiff corporation or any of its members in the city of New York or elsewhere, and from coercing or obtaining by command, threats, strikes, or otherwise the dismissal or discharge by any employer, contractor, or owner, of the members of the plaintiff corporation, or the plaintiff McQueed, or any or either of them from their work, employment, or business, or in any wise interfering with the lawful business or work of the plaintiff corporation or of its members. But the defendants are not, nor is any one of them, enjoined and restrained from refusing to work with the plaintiff or any member of the plaintiff corporation.

This judgment was reversed in the Supreme Court, and its action was affirmed by the court of appeals and judgment absolute ordered for the defendant.

It appears, from an examination of the case, that the defendants, Cumming and Nugent, members of the board of delegates and representing the Enterprise and Progress associations, had caused the plaintiff and other members of the national association to be discharged from various buildings in the course of erection, and the employment in their stead of members of the Progress and Enterprise associations. The discharges were the results of statements on the part of the delegates that unless the plaintiffs were discharged there would be general strikes called upon the buildings where plaintiffs were employed. I desire to quote, at this point, briefly from the opinion of Judge Parker (in full in Appendix F). He lays down in the most comprehensive terms the rule that members of a labor union have not only the right to refuse to work with others, but that it does not affect their right because the reason given does not seem adequate to other people so long as the object to be attained is a legal one. He says:

Stated in other words, the propositions quoted recognize the right of one man to refuse to work for another on any ground that he may regard as sufficient, and the employer has no right to demand a reason for it. But there is, I take it, no legal objection to the employee's giving a reason, if he has one, and the fact that the reason given is that he refuses to work with another who is not a member of his organization, whether stated to his employer or not, does not affect his right to stop work, nor does it give a cause of action to the workman to whom he objects because the employer sees fit to discharge the man objected to rather than lose the services of the objector.

The same rule applies to a body of men who, having organized for purposes deemed beneficial to themselves, refuse to work. Their reasons may seem inadequate to others, but if it seems to be in their interests as members of an organization to refuse longer to work, it is their legal right to stop. The reason may no more be demanded as a right of the organization than of the individual, but if they elect to state the reason their right to stop work is not cut off because the reason seems inadequate or selfish to the employer or to organized society. And if the conduct of the members of an organization is legal in itself, it does not become illegal because the organization directs one of its members to state the reason for its conduct. * * *

It is the giving of this information (that unless members of the plaintiff organization were discharged and those of defendant organizations employed, general strikes would be ordered), a simple notification of their determination, which it was right and proper and reasonable to give, that has been characterized as "threats" by the special term, and which has led to no inconsiderable amount of misunderstanding since. But the sense in which the word was employed by the court is of no consequence, for the defendant associations had the absolute right to threaten to do that which they had the right to do. Having the right to insist that plaintiff's men be discharged and defendant's men be put in their place if the services of the other members of the organization were to be retained, they also had the right to threaten that none of their men would stay unless their members could have all the work there was to do.

This decision is of the utmost importance to those really interested in laboring men and mechanics organized for the betterment of their condition. It is refreshing to have it stated in such unmistakable terms that men do not sacrifice rights merely by banding into what are known as "labor organizations."

Within the past few weeks I have frequently attempted to state this principle in answering communications severe in denouncement of the so-called "anti-injunction" bills now pending in this House. I had in mind this language used in the Cummings case by Judge Parker:

A man may threaten to do that which the law says he may do, provided that, within the rules laid down in those cases, his motive is to help himself. A labor organization is endowed with precisely the same legal right as is an individual, to threaten to do that which it may lawfully do.

Such a declaration of what the law is can readily be comprehended by the lay mind; yet it is often misunderstood and sometimes ignored even by those charged with the duty of interpreting the law.

IMPARTIAL ADMINISTRATION OF LAW ESSENTIAL FOR WELFARE OF SOCIETY.

I have no desire to pose as the champion of lawlessness by members of labor organizations any more than to excuse those aggregations of capital which conduct their operations in defiance of law. Unlawfulness on the part of either labor or capital is inexcusable, and the laws should be enforced impartially against all violators, regardless of the accidental attribute of wealth or of its lack. As was well said by the President in his annual message to this Congress:

No man is above the law and no man is below it; nor do we ask any man's permission when we require him to obey it. Obedience to the law is demanded as a right, not asked as a favor.

This is an age of organization. Everywhere the tendency seems to be towards concentration. Capital combines that industrial enterprises may be carried on in a style more colossal than the world has ever before imagined; labor organizes the more easily to resist the continued encroachments of aggrandized wealth and to better the condition of the masses. Within recent times the industrial world has undergone a rapid evolution. In the transition abuses have grown up which, on all sides, it is conceded must speedily be eliminated. Society suffers from actions that seemingly transcend the law, but yet are difficult to control by legal process. Our duty is to build up, not to destroy. Our best efforts should be directed so to legislate that neither organized labor nor organized capital shall be done injustice, but that both shall be so regulated, controlled, and promoted by wise and sane measures that the interests of all men shall be advanced and the social equilibrium undisturbed. [Loud applause.]

APPENDIX A.

PEOPLE EX REL. RODGERS VS. COLER, 166 NEW YORK, 1.

PARKER, Ch. J. (dissenting).

The reasoning by which the decision about to be made is sought to be supported fails to persuade me that it is other than a judicial encroachment upon legislative prerogative; for it is that and nothing less if the statute does not offend against either the Federal or State constitution. If the statute, which seems to be regarded by some as vicious in its tendency, attempted to regulate the question of wages as between citizens of the State so as to affect even in the slightest degree the basis on which one citizen should contract with another, then not only would much of the discussion which this statute has invoked be relevant, but the decision about to be made would be unquestionably sound.

The legislature, however, intended nothing of the kind, and the statute not only omits to express any such purpose, but it is so carefully guarded as to leave no room for doubt that the legislature, appreciating the limits of its authority, intended to and did simply provide with certainty that those who work directly for the State or upon public works within the State shall receive that which may be termed "going wages" in the locality in which any particular public work is being carried on as will at once appear from a reading of the statute, so much of which as is germane to the question under discussion being set out in the statement of facts. In other words, the legislature, which is vested with the power to direct the conduct of the business operations of the State, by this statute has not only declared it to be the policy of the State as a proprietor to pay the prevailing rate of wages, but has enjoined upon its several agents and agencies the duty of executing this policy. An attack upon this statute, therefore, assails the right of the State as a proprietor to pay such wages as it chooses to those who either work for it directly or upon any work of construction in which it may be engaged.

No one has presumed to challenge the right of an individual either to pay the prevailing rate of wages in his locality or, if he concludes to have his work done by contract, to refuse to award it to a contractor who will not agree to pay the going wages to all employees that may be engaged upon the work. But the State seems to be regarded in some quarters as having less power as a proprietor than an individual, so that what an individual may contract to do in the performance of his own work the State itself may not do when it assumes the rôle of proprietor and attempts the construction of important work.

Now, having called attention to the fact that the statute by its terms is expressly limited to laborers employed upon the work of which the State, in its entirety or through some subdivision thereof, is the proprietor, we come to the question whether there is any provision of either the Federal or State constitution that so far restricts the power of the State in constructing its buildings or other public works that it has less liberty of action than one of its citizens.

That it has, to say the least, as much power as a proprietor as has any of the individuals of which its citizenship is comprised would seem to be a self-evident proposition. But as evidence is not wanting that it is not so regarded by others the subject must have some consideration. In 1889 the legislature provided by statute that from and after the passage of the act the wages of day laborers employed by the State, or any officer thereof, should not be less than $2 per day. (Chapter 380 of the Laws of 1889.) It is difficult to imagine from what source the idea could have been born that this statute was unconstitutional, in view of the fact that it was known of all men that the legislature had always fixed the compensation of its executive, legislative, and judicial officers, and had provided from the beginning what compensation, if any, should be paid to all the county and city officers throughout the State. Indeed, the compensation for every kind and character of service whatsoever had always been fixed either by the legislature directly or through agencies created by it, the original source of power in all cases being the legislature.

Nevertheless, there were those who conceived the absurd idea that there was some distinction between the compensation for day laborers and the compensation for all others engaged in the service of the State, and so the demand of one Clark, who was employed upon the canals for the compensation fixed by the legislature, was challenged and finally came to this court, where the question was put at rest by a unanimous decision, which held that "there is no express or implied restriction to be found in the Constitution upon the power of the legislature to fix and declare the rate of compensation to be paid for labor or services performed upon the public works of the State; that legislation is doubtless open to criticism from the standpoint of sound policy and expediency, but the courts have nothing to do with these questions so long as it is not in conflict with the Constitution, and we think that a general law regulating the compensation of laborers employed by the State or by officers under its authority, which disturbs no vested right or contract, was within the power of the legislature to enact, whatever may be said as to its wisdom or policy." (Clark v. State of New York, 142 N. Y., 401.)

Now, certainly it need not be argued that, if the Constitution contains no restriction "upon the power of the legislature to fix and declare the rate of compensation to be paid for labor or services performed on the public works of the State," there is nothing in the Constitution to restrict the power of the legislature in declaring that "the rate of compensation to be paid for labor or service performed on the public works of the State" "shall (in the language of the statute) not be less than the prevailing rate for a day's work in the same trade or occupation in the locality within the State where such public work on, about, or in connection with which labor is performed, in its final or completed form is to be situated, erected, or used." So, if authority be needed, we have the authority of this court that the legislature has the power to provide that the policy of the State shall be to pay the going rate of wages in the locality in which a public work is to be done and to command its agents to obey its directions in that regard.

For illustration, were it now engaged in the erection of a new capitol, the public officer or officers having in charge the construction by appointment of the legislature would, under the authority of the Clark case, be obliged to pay the prevailing rate of wages in Albany, and if, in the course of construction, it should be determined to do some part of the work by contract, as was the case during the last year of work upon the capitol, those having in charge the construction would be obliged to provide in the contract that the contractor should pay the prevailing rate of wages in Albany. Of course a contractor would not be obliged to accept a contract under such terms, but certainly would do so if he wished to work, for the State as proprietor would have the right to impose any terms it might choose as a condition of awarding the contract, just as an individual might do.

Terms might thus be imposed which would be wise or very foolish for both the State and the contractor, in the estimation of the latter; but it is the proprietor's right to be unwise if he so wills, in which respect the State is perhaps both in theory and practice on an equality with its citizens. The provision in the contract requiring, in effect, that he should pay the going wages would, of course, interfere with his liberty to hire men for lower wages. So a provision that he must use a certain brand of cement which is no better and costs more than other brands would interfere with his liberty to buy first-class cement at a lower price than the brand named. A provision that some or all of the figure work cut out of stone should be done by workmen from Italy, would perhaps interfere with the employment at less expense of men of equal or greater skill at home who could do equally good or better work, and to that extent his liberty to so contract as to make a greater profit for himself, without injury to the proprietor, would be interfered with, but it is interfered with only because he assents to the proprietor's wishes and contracts that it shall be so, and hence his liberty is not interfered with at all within the meaning of the constitution; for he has solemnly covenanted in his agreement that he shall not be at liberty to do anything in the course of the performance of the contract that shall be contrary to the wishes of the proprietor, as expressed in the written contract.

I have yet to hear an argument from any quarter offered for the purpose of showing that the State, as a proprietor, could not in the erection, for instance, of a new capitol, fix the wages to be paid by its contractors, provide that its sculptors should come from Italy, its decorators from Paris, its stone from specific quarries in Massachusetts, and its cement from England, when perhaps better results could be obtained should only residents of this State be employed and the material purchased within its own borders. But it is said that this statute goes further and applies not only to the work undertaken by the State at large, but also to the public works carried on in the several municipalities of the State, the particular case before the court growing out of a contract made between the city of New York and the relator, by which the latter agreed to regulate and grade West One hundred and thirty-fifth street in that city from Amsterdam avenue to the Boulevard.

The authority of the State, however, is supreme in every part of it, and in all of the public undertakings the State is the proprietor. For convenience of local administration the State has been divided into municipalities, in each of which there may be found local officers exercising a certain measure of authority, but in that which they do they are but the agents of the State, without power to do a single act beyond the boundary set by the State acting through its legislature.

Charters are given to cities by means of which are created what are known as "municipal corporations," but the creation is solely for the purpose of doing the work of the State in the particular locality affected, and in the creation of these agencies the legislature designates the number of officers, determines what they shall be called, prescribes what particular portion of the municipal work each shall do, fixes their compensation, and provides a method by which shall be chosen a proper amount of assistance, clerical and otherwise, to perform the work, and from time to time enlarges or restricts the fields of labor of the several officers; it also from time to time by special enactment authorizes undertakings of large public importance, not contemplated, perhaps, at the time of the granting of the charter or at the time of a general revision of it. If the legislature becomes dissatisfied with the general working of a charter it may change it or create a new one, for it is possessed of supreme authority to provide the method by which the municipal affairs shall be conducted and to determine what great public works, if any, shall be undertaken. If it shall determine that the city is in need of a large supply of pure and wholesome water, the legislature, and the legislature alone, may provide the machinery by which that result may be accomplished. In the doing of it the legislature may devolve the administration of the details of the work upon the local municipal officers already in existence, or it may select another agency without even consulting the wishes of either the taxpayers or the voters of a city, as was the case in the building of the new aqueduct, which was authorized by chapter 490 of the laws of 1883.

The act was entitled "An act to provide new reservoirs, dams, and a new aqueduct, with the appurtenances thereto, for the purpose of supplying the city of New York with an increased supply of pure and wholesome water." It contained full authority for the execution of this vast undertaking, which was expected to and did cost the city of New York very many millions of dollars, under the direction of six commissioners named in the act, upon whom was devolved both the power and the duty of effectuating the purpose of the legislature as expressed in the statute. The constitution has, of course, imposed some restrictions upon the legislative power, such, for instance, as that the legislature shall not authorize the construction of a street surface railroad without the consent of the local authorities and 50 per cent of the abutting property owners, or in lieu thereof the consent of the appellate division of the supreme court. But prior to the incorporation of such a provision into the constitution the legislature had the power, and until 1850 exercised it, of authorizing the construction of street surface railroads without the consent of either the local authorities or the property owners, as will appear from an examination of the statutes referred to in Ingersoll v. Nassau Railroad Company. (157 N. Y., at p. 486.)

Similar instances almost without number might be multiplied, all of which would serve as illustrations merely that the State acting through its legislature has absolute power and control over all the public works within the State, undertaken and carried on with public funds, whether the work be paid for by a municipality or by the State at large, and that those who let the contracts, superintend the construction, audit the bills and pay them, are, in such work but the agents of the State, whether the agency be created by the provisions of a charter or by special enactment. If authority be needed in support of this proposition, it may be found in Williams v. Eggleston (170 U. S., 304). At page 310 the court says: "A municipal corporation is, so far as its purely municipal relations are concerned, simply an agency of the State for conducting the affairs of government, and as such it is subject to the control of the legislature."

Authority to the same effect may also be found in cases in this court, of which Mayor v. Tenth National Bank (111 N. Y., 446) is a type. In that case the question presented was whether the city of New York could be compelled by the legislature to pay to the Tenth National Bank moneys that it had advanced without authority of law to the county commissioners which were in part misappropriated by them, the balance of the moneys being used in the construction of the court-house in New York City. The act of the legislature requiring the city to pay to the bank the moneys advanced by it was upheld in this court, and in the course of the opinion the court said: "Municipal corporations are creatures of the State and exist and act in subordination to its sovereign power. The legislature may determine what moneys they may raise and expend, and what taxation for municipal purposes may be imposed; and it certainly does not exceed its constitutional authority when it compels a municipal corporation to pay a debt which has some meritorious basis to rest on."

Other authorities in which the proposition is in effect either decided or asserted that a municipal corporation is simply an agency of the State for the conduct of the affairs of government, and therefore subject to the control of the legislature in all respects except as expressly limited by the constitution, are: In re Protestant Episcopal School (46 N. Y., 178); Terrett v. Taylor (9 Cranch, 43); Payne v. Treadwell (16 Cal., 221); Jones v. Town of Lake View (151 Ill., 663); Mayor, etc., of Frederick v. Groshon (30 Md., 436); Groff v. Mayor, etc., of Frederick City (44 Md., 67); State Bank v. Madison (3 Ind., 43); City of Paterson v. Society for E. U. M. (24 N. J. L., 385); State ex rel. Cleveland v. Board of Finance, etc. (38 N. J. L., 259); In re Dalton (59 Pac. Rep., 330).

In the latter case the petitioner was arrested for violating the provisions of chapter 114 of the laws of 1891 of the State of Kansas, which provided that eight hours should constitute a day's work for laborers, workmen, mechanics, and other persons employed by or on behalf of the State of Kansas, or by or on behalf of any county, city, township, or other municipality in the State. He sought to be relieved from trial through habeas corpus proceedings, claiming that the act was unconstitutional. The court thought that the statute was constitutional, and in the course of the opinion the court said:

"Whatever orders the State may give directly to its own agents it may require of its political subdivisions, instrumentalities of said government, such as counties, cities, townships. These subdivisions are merely involuntary political or civil divisions of the State, created by statute to aid in the administration of government. 'A county is one of the civil divisions of a country for judicial and political purposes, created by the sovereign power of the State of its own will, without the particular solicitation, consent, or concurrent action of the people who inhabit it; a local organization, which for the purpose of civil administration is invested with certain functions of corporate existence.' It has been held competent for the legislature to establish a State road and cast the cost and expense thereof upon the county in which the road lies, without the consent of the officers or people of the county,

And, in like manner, it may require the county to build a certain kind or number of bridges at specified places, another county to build roads in a particular locality, and another to build public buildings; and for this and other public purposes the counties and other municipalities could be required to levy a tax and make other provisions for the payment of such improvements. Indeed, everything relating to the management of counties, cities, and townships not defined and limited by the Constitution may be taken away by the State, acting through its legislature; and as to these political divisions and their agents the legislature has the same power that it possesses over State officers. We conclude, therefore, that the statute under consideration is a mere direction of the State to its agents and a proper exercise of its power in that respect."

If the views so far expressed be sound, it would seem to follow that the position taken by the State in enacting this statute is precisely like that of an individual who for any reason determines that if it be a little more than honest, as that term is usually employed, it is not more than just to pay for a thing what it is fairly worth, and that the principle should be applied as well to the compensation of labor as to the payment for material, and hence decides that in construction work he will pay the market price. The State, having determined upon such a course of action by this statute, directs its agents and agencies, wherever throughout the State they may be situated, that in the doing of a public work they shall pay the going wages whenever the work is to be done by day's work, and whenever it is to be done by contract, then the agent, wherever situated, shall put into the contract that it executes by authority of the State a provision that the contractor shall pay such rate.

There are no authorities in this State that militate against the position that I have taken. On the contrary, such as there are support it. In People v. Warren (77 Hun, 120) the defendant had been charged before a police magistrate with a violation of section 504, chapter 105 of the laws of 1891, entitled "An act to revise the charter of the city of Buffalo." That charter provided, among other things, that "in contracting for any work required to be done by the city a clause shall be inserted that the contractor submitting proposals shall bind himself in the performance of such work not to discriminate either as to workmen or wages against members of labor organizations, or to accept any more than eight hours as a day's work, to be performed within nine consecutive hours."

The defendant having been convicted, an appeal was taken to the general term, fifth department, where the argument was made that the statute was unconstitutional because offending against the provisions of section 1, article 14 of the Constitution of the United States, and of the provisions of section 1, article 1 of the constitution of the State of New York. It was held by a unanimous court that the statute was constitutional, and the judgment of conviction was affirmed. Subsequently an unsuccessful attempt was made to secure a different result through the instrumentality of a writ of habeas corpus. I take an extract from the opinion, which was written by Judge Hatch, because it is in point on the next proposition that I propose to discuss. "It is said that defendant is an independent contractor, and consequently the rules we have invoked have no application to the case. If this were conceded it might not be possible to answer the claim. But the assertion itself, as I view the facts, is far from being true. In the sense that the defendant is doing work for the city of Buffalo to furnish all material and labor in making a public improvement for a given sum, it is a fact. But that it is relieved from the obligations imposed by the State upon the city of Buffalo and assumed by it is not true as matter of law. * * * The city said to the defendant and to all other contractors when it invited the bids for the performance of the work, 'The statute is one of the conditions which must be complied with and an obligation which must be assumed by the contracting party.' The defendant was not obliged to bid. The conditions imposed applied equally to all who should bid. The act of bidding was with full knowledge and voluntary. Under these conditions defendant made its bid, and when awarded the contract voluntarily executed the same and assumed the obligations imposed upon the city by the statute. How can it be said that he was an independent contractor, freed of obligations? He was an independent contractor, but he is not independent of the obligations imposed by the contract." (People ex rel. Warren v. Beck, 10 Misc. Rep., 77.)

It should also be said before passing to the consideration of the contract that the judge before whom this matter came at special term was of the opinion that the act is constitutional, and while there was a difference of view in the appellate division as to certain questions, not one of the judges of that court expressed an opinion that the State in so far as it directed its agents to insert a provision in the contract that the prevailing rate of wages should be paid, acted beyond its power.

Indeed, in the prevailing opinion it is said: "I am satisfied that the legislature has power to prescribe the form of contracts which shall be made by municipal corporations with those entering into contracts with it. No one is bound to enter into such a contract or to do work for a municipal corporation, but when he does he must accept the terms of the contract as prescribed by law, and if he voluntarily makes a contract by which he is to receive pay only upon condition of his performing certain obligations or doing work that he agrees to do in a certain way, the contractor certainly can not complain if the city refuses to pay except upon his compliance with the terms of the engagement."

Since the argument there has been evolved the notion that the few constitutional limitations upon the power of the State to control at will through legislative action all the affairs of municipalities, in some way helps out the contention of the majority that the State is not the proprietor in the grading and construction of the street in question. It seems to me that the effect of these exceptions is to prove the rule, if proof be needed, that the State can do what it chooses in respect to public improvements anywhere within its borders, whether the territory affected be within city limits or in the rural sections of the State, provided only that it does not transcend the limitations that the people have seen fit to place upon that power by means of the constitution. That instrument will be searched in vain for any restrictions upon the power of the legislature to grade or improve highways. The legislature may provide for the building of bridges over streams separating counties, or towns, or both. It may do this at the expense of the State, or at the expense of the towns affected, or of the adjoining counties, or the expense may be apportioned in such manner as the State sees fit. It may build and improve roads at the joint expense of the State and the locality more immediately benefited by the construction of the road, or part of the expense may be assessed upon the property of individuals abutting upon the improved highway; and in cities it may determine to have streets graded and improved and the entire expense assessed upon the property in the neighborhood which is supposed to benefit by the improvement; or it may assess the entire sum upon the city, or apportion the cost between the two. But, however the moneys necessary to pay the expense of such an improvement may be raised, it is the State that authorizes the improvement, selects the agency by which it is conducted, and alone determines the source from which the money needed to pay the expense shall come, and its power in that respect has no limitation whatever.

The prevailing opinions discuss a question which is not up for decision—namely, whether the legislature has the power to provide that the municipal authorities shall pay to their employees going wages. As the discussion which that question has received is, in my opinion, obiter, I shall not refer to it further than to say that I dissent from the views expressed in relation thereto on the ground that the statute offends no provision of the constitution when it undertakes to provide that the city shall pay the prevailing rate of wages to those who work for it. Who denies the power of the legislature to fix the rate of compensation for the mayor, the comptroller, the police commissioner, the clerk, the attendant, and the messenger? If anyone does I have not heard him. Why may it not then fix the rate of compensation of the engineer in charge of its heating and ventilating apparatus, its skilled mechanics, or its street sweepers? Where in the constitution is to be found the provision that so discriminates between the classes into which the public service is divided as to allow the legislature to provide certainty and stability of compensation as to the one and denies a similar power as to the other? My attention has not been called to such a provision, nor have I been able to find it after diligent search.

I have considered the constitutionality of the statute, because it has been insisted, as I think erroneously, that the feature of the statute which is in controversy here is unconstitutional. But if, on the other hand, it were to be conceded that it is unconstitutional, I do not see how it could avail this relator. If the contract were silent on the subject, and the claim made was that the contractor could not recover for work performed because he had not complied with the provisions of the statute requiring contractors to pay the prevailing rate of wages, then he would not only be in a position to attack the constitutionality of the statute, but an adjudication that it was unconstitutional would relieve him from the necessity of paying the prevailing rate of wages. But that is not this case. In the contract between the city and this relator it is agreed in terms that "the wages to be paid for a legal day's work, as hereinbefore defined, to all classes of such laborers, workmen, or mechanics upon all such public work, or upon any material to be used upon or in connection therewith, shall not be less than the prevailing rate for a day's work in the same trade or occupation in the locality within the State where such public work on, about, or in connection with which labor is performed, in its final or completed form, is to be situated, erected, or used." And it was further in terms agreed that "this contract shall be void and of no effect unless the person or corporation making or performing the same shall comply with the provisions of the labor law." So that not only in terms did the contractor agree to pay the prevailing rate of wages, but the agreement also in effect made the provisions of the labor law a part of the contract.

Whether, therefore, the statute was unconstitutional or not, there was nothing to prevent this relator from consenting to the incorporation of the phraseology of the statute into the contract, and when he did that and voluntarily executed the contract, as in this case, he can not effectively plead as an excuse for the violation of his contract that, inasmuch as certain of its provisions are void when embodied in a statute, they are also void when incorporated into a voluntarily executed contract.

While the majority of the appellate division agreed that the statute was constitutional in so far as it provided for the payment of the prevailing rate of wages, and also that the relator, having voluntarily executed the contract, he is entitled to payment for work done only upon condition of his performing its stipulations, still they were of the opinion that the relator was entitled to a mandamus because the officers of the municipal corporation had failed to avoid the contract prior to the institution of the proceeding.

If the conclusion of the majority was wrong in this respect, they conceded that the defendant rightly succeeded at special term, and, as it seems to be very clear that it was wrong, I shall content myself with a brief presentation of the reasons, and shall omit all reference to the question, also discussed, whether the contract became void by direct operation of the statute upon the contract and its conceded breach. If the statute purported to accomplish such a result, the court thought that it might be unconstitutional. But I shall not consider whether it does purport to accomplish such a result or whether, if it did, it would offend against the constitution, for, as I view it, the question is not before us. Certainly it can not affect the disposition of this matter if what the comptroller did operated to avoid the contract. It is because I think he did all that the situation required in order to enable the city to take advantage of the relator's breach of the contract that leads me to a different result than that reached by the appellate division, for we alike agree on the constitutionality of the statute, so far as it is involved in the proceeding and in the binding effect of every provision of the contract.

It is not easy to appreciate the argument that admits the validity of the contract; its open violation by the relator; concedes that the provision is clear and unambiguous that declares it shall be null and void in the event of such a violation, and still contends that a recovery may be had in the face of the defense urged by every legal method, viz, that the relator can not recover because the contract has become void by his act.

What act it was necessary for the comptroller to do in order to take advantage of the defense the relator had furnished other than first to refuse to pay and afterwards to defend on the ground that the contract was void, owing to the relator's violation of it, has not been suggested. It has been found easier, no doubt, to say that the comptroller, as the fiscal officer, had to do something than to point out the thing he had to do.

It is the relator's violated agreement which entitles the defendant to claim that this contract is no longer of any effect. For it must not be forgotten that this relator comes into court admitting that he has violated the contract by failing to pay the prevailing rate of wages as he agreed to do, and by his contract he agreed that the effect of his failure to do so should cause the contract to become void and of no effect.

The argument that the relator is entitled to a mandamus against the comptroller because he had not avoided the contract before this proceeding was instituted, seems to me without force. It appears affirmatively that the comptroller was not informed that the relator was violating his contract until the 19th day of April, 1900, and that he set on foot an investigation for the purpose of learning the truth of the matter immediately thereafter, with the result that the information received by him was fully confirmed.

Now, the certificate made by the commissioner of highways certifying to the correctness of the relator's account, showing a balance due, to secure a warrant, for which this proceeding was instituted, was dated April 23, 1900, or only four days after the comptroller was first advised of any act leading him to suspect that the relator was violating the contract. From these facts it is apparent that there was nothing in the situation to justify the conclusion that the comptroller allowed him to go on with his work after knowledge on the part of the comptroller that it was within his power to avoid the contract on behalf of the municipality.

On the contrary, it is apparent that no part of the work for which a warrant is claimed was performed after the comptroller's knowledge of the relator's default. This proceeding was instituted about three weeks afterwards, and hence it is manifest that, so far as this claim is concerned, the relator has nothing to complain of in the conduct of the comptroller, assuming, without admitting, that a complaint of that general character could have any legal value toward restoring to life a void contract.

This proceeding was instituted against the comptroller because he refused to deliver to the relator a warrant for the amount of the certified account. The reason for it is set up in his return, and is to the effect that the relator had executed a contract by which he had agreed that in the event of his failure to perform certain of its terms and conditions the contract should be void; that he had failed to comply with such terms, and that hence the contract is void and the city not liable. Now, if there is anything else that the comptroller was bound to do under the circumstances in order to get rid of paying the amount claimed to be due under a contract that had become void, it has not been pointed out. He resisted payment both before and after the commencement of legal proceedings on the ground that the contract had become void because of the conduct of the contractor, and that is all he was obliged to do in order to relieve the city from making further payments under a void contract.

If the facts were as assumed by the learned judge at the appellate division, that the city authorities with knowledge of the violation of a contract which authorized the city to treat it as void nevertheless permitted the contractor to go on with his work by which the amount in question was earned, it might very well be that a court of equity would undertake to relieve a party from the loss that would otherwise result on the ground that it was the duty of the officers of the city to speak and not to hide their intentions for the purpose of getting work for nothing out of the contractor. But those considerations have no place in a proceeding by mandamus where the relator can only succeed by establishing a clear legal right to that which he demands.

I advise a reversal of the order of the appellate division and an affirmance of that of the special term.

APPENDIX B.

RYAN VS. CITY OF NEW YORK, 177 NEW YORK, 271.

PARKER, Ch. J.: There are two questions presented by this review. The first is, Has the legislature power to provide that its employees and those of the several municipalities shall receive "not less than the prevailing rate" of wages in the locality? In other words, has the legislature—which possesses all the power of the sovereign not expressly withheld by the Constitution—power to provide that work done for it or its several subdivisions shall be paid for at such a rate as individuals and corporations in the same locality pay?

That question was before this court some years ago in so far as it affects the right of the legislature to fix the rate of wages of laborers upon the works of the State. (Clark v. State of New York, 142 N. Y., 101.) In 1889 the legislature passed an act (L. 1889, ch. 380) providing that the rate of wages upon the public works of the State should be $2 a day. That was more than the then prevailing rate, and there were those who questioned the power of the State to interfere with its agents in fixing the wages of men working under them. They thought the superintendent of public works had the sole power of fixing wages of employees in that department, and therefore could defy the direction of the legislature as to the amount of compensation to be paid, although he could disburse such moneys only as were appropriated by the legislature. And they entreated the attorney-general to commence an action to have the court declare the impotency of the legislature to interfere on the important subject of compensation to laborers.

But when the case reached this court in 1894 the attorney-general was unable to point to the provision of the constitution which divested the representatives of the people for all matters of legislation of this power, and vested it in the several inferior officials having charge of certain administrative duties conferred upon them in the majority of instances by acts of the same legislature. The court, unaffected, as was its duty, by the argument that the statute was unwise and mindful that its duty was discharged fully and could only be discharged by declaring whether the legislature had the power to enact the statute complained of, unanimously held that the power belonged to it. Judge O'Brien, writing for the unanimous court, says (142 N. Y., 101, 105): "There is no express or implied restriction to be found in the constitution upon the power of the legislature to fix and declare the rate of compensation to be paid for labor or services performed upon the public works of the State."

The principle of that decision controls this one. There the legislature undertakes to fix arbitrarily the sum to be paid to every employee of the State. Here the legislature undertakes to provide for the payment of not less than the prevailing rate of wages, not only to the direct employees of the State, but also to its indirect employees working in its several subdivisions—the cities, counties, towns, and villages. In the administration of the affairs of those subdivisions, as well as in those of the State at large, the legislature is unrestrained unless by express provisions of the constitution. As expressed in Rodgers's case (166 N. Y., 1, 29): "The authority of the State is supreme in every part of it and in all of the public undertakings the State is the proprietor. For convenience of local administration the State has been divided into municipalities, in each of which there may be found local officers exercising a certain measure of authority, but in that which they do they are but the agents of the State, without power to do a single act beyond the boundary set by the State, acting through its legislature." Thus all of these agencies and employees in the several municipalities are doing the work of the State, which is the sovereign and master.

Nevertheless, we find that the argument is again made, as in 1894 in Clark's case, that the legislature is without power to interfere with the agencies it has created for the government of the municipalities. And this is said in the face of the decision in Clark's case, and notwithstanding the fact that the legislature has the power at any time to absolutely change the form of government of a municipality, to blot out of existence any municipal charter, or to consolidate several municipalities under a single charter, as it did in the creation of Greater New York. And this argument is made in spite of the many well-known illustrations of the power of the legislature to control the affairs of municipalities. The scope of that power is illustrated by the construction of the new aqueduct by a board created by the legislature, the expense being charged upon the city of New York, although not a single officer of the city had a voice in controlling the expenditure of the millions that its construction involved; and by the act compelling the elevation of the Harlem railroad tracks in the city of New York, and the imposition of one-half of the expense, amounting to several millions, upon the city of New York, the work all being done through an agency created by the State.

Not only does the legislature fix the salaries of the principal municipal officers throughout the State, but in the city of New York, where this case arises, it fixes the rate of compensation for many laborers. The street-cleaning department will serve as an illustration. The charter provides for the payment of definite sums in some cases, and for a maximum sum in others, for a force numbering over 5,000 employees in that department, and including 3,100 sweepers and 1,600 drivers, hostlers, and stable foremen. The charter in this respect has the support of Clark's case (supra). Now, there are a few mechanics connected with the department whose compensation is not fixed by the charter, and who, therefore, come under the prevailing-rate provision of the labor law. Their compensation could be fixed, of course, at a definite sum, as that of the other employees is, but instead it is provided in effect that they shall be paid at a rate not less than that paid by others for similar services in that locality. Certainly no one can argue that the legislature can provide that the street sweeper shall be paid, for example, $2 a day, but can not provide that he shall be paid the prevailing rate of wages when that happens to be $2. But if one can be found who will attempt to make such an argument, surely it can be safely said that he can not find a constitutional provision upon which to rest it.

Since the foregoing was written the opinion of the United States Supreme Court in Atkin v. State of Kansas (191 U. S., 207) has been brought to our attention. It is in point and decides the question in accordance with the views we have already expressed. A Kansas statute provides that "eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, mechanics, or other persons now employed, or who may hereafter be employed, by or on behalf of the State of Kansas, or by or on behalf of any county, city, township, or other municipality of said State. * * * Not less than the current rate of per diem wages in the locality where the work is performed shall be paid to laborers, workmen, mechanics, and other persons employed by or on behalf of the State of Kansas, or any county, city, township, or other municipality of said State. * * * All contracts hereafter made by or on behalf of the State of Kansas, or by or on behalf of any county, city, township, or other municipality of said State, with any corporation, person, or persons, for the performance of any work or the furnishing of any material manufactured within the State of Kansas shall be deemed and considered as made upon the basis of eight hours constituting a day's work."

A violation of the statute is a misdemeanor. Atkin made a contract with a municipality—Kansas City—to pave a street. He was convicted under the statute, and the conviction affirmed by the Kansas supreme court. It was argued before the United States Supreme Court that the statute violates the fourteenth amendment in that it deprives the contractor of his liberty and property without due process of law and denies him the equal protection of the laws. The court holds that the statute does not violate the fourteenth amendment, and in the course of the opinion, written by Mr. Justice Harlan, says: "'If a statute,' counsel observes, 'such as the one under consideration, is justifiable, should it not apply to all persons and to all vocations whatsoever? Why should such a law be limited to contractors with the State and its municipalities? * * * Why should the law allow a contractor to agree with a laborer to shovel dirt for ten hours a day in performance of a private contract, and make exactly the same act under similar conditions a misdemeanor when done in performance of a contract for the construction of a public improvement? Why is liberty with reference to contracting restricted in one case and not in the other?'

These questions—indeed, the entire argument of defendant's counsel—seem to attach too little consequence to the relation existing between a State and its municipal corporations. Such corporations are the creatures, mere political subdivisions, of the State for the purpose of exercising a part of its powers. They may exert only such powers as are expressly granted to them, or such as may be necessarily implied from those granted. What they lawfully do of a public character is done under the sanction of the State. They are, in every essential sense, only auxiliaries of the State for the purposes of local government.

They may be created, or, having been created, their powers may be restricted or enlarged, or altogether withdrawn, at the will of the legislature; the authority of the legislature, when restricting or withdrawing such powers, being subject only to the fundamental condition that the collective and individual rights of the people of the municipality shall not thereby be destroyed. (Citing several cases, the last being Williams v. Eggleston, 170 U. S., 304, 310.) In the last cases cited we said that "a municipal corporation is, so far as its purely municipal relations are concerned, simply an agency of the State for conducting the affairs of government, and as such it is subject to the control of the legislature."

The court quotes with approval from the opinion in City of Clinton v. Cedar Rapids and Missouri River Railway Company (24 Iowa, 455, 475): "Municipal corporations owe their origin to and derive their powers and rights wholly from the legislature. It breathes into them the breath of life, without which they can not exist. As it creates, so it may destroy. If it may destroy, it may abridge and control. Unless there is some constitutional limitation on the right, the legislature might, by a single act, if we can suppose it capable of so great a folly and so great a wrong, sweep from existence all of the municipal corporations in the State, and the corporation could not prevent it. We know of no limitation upon this right, so far as the corporations themselves are concerned. They are, so to phrase it, the mere tenants at will of the legislature."

After referring to the possible motive of the legislature in making the statute, the court continued: "We have no occasion here to consider these questions or to determine upon which side is the sounder reason, for whatever may have been the motives controlling the enactment of the statute in question, we can imagine no possible ground to dispute the power of the State to declare that no one undertaking work for it or for one of its municipal agencies should permit or require an employee on such work to labor in excess of eight hours each day and to inflict punishment upon those who are embraced by such regulations and yet disregard them. It can not be deemed a part of the liberty of any contractor that he be allowed to do public work in any mode he may choose to adopt, without regard to the wishes of the State. On the contrary, it belongs to the State as guardian and trustee for its people, and having control of its affairs to prescribe the conditions upon which it will permit public work to be done on its behalf or on behalf of its municipalities. No court has authority to review its action in that respect. Regulations upon this subject suggest only considerations of public policy. And with such considerations the courts have no concern."

The case under consideration is not controlled by Rodgers's case (166 N. Y., 1). The decision in that case is that so much of the statute as in effect requires a contractor for municipal work to agree that he will pay his workmen not less than the prevailing rate of wages, and makes the contract void if he fails to pay at such rate, at least, is unconstitutional. It is said by the court in support of that decision that the statute invades rights of liberty and property in that it denies to the contractor the right to agree with employees as to the rate of compensation, and imposes a penalty upon the right of the contractor to agree with employees upon terms of employment. It is true that in one of the prevailing opinions argument sufficiently broad to cover this case is made, but it is not necessary for the decision, and is obiter, and therefore need not be followed. Our conclusion is that so much of the statute as is involved in this case is constitutional.

The second question presented by the record is: Did the plaintiff waive his right to insist that his compensation should be at the prevailing rate of wages for rammers in the city of New York? Section 3 of the labor law does not attempt to fix in dollars and cents the wages to be paid to those employed on State or municipal work, but provides that such wages "shall not be less than the prevailing rate for a day's work in the same trade or occupation in the locality." The statute, therefore, made it the duty of the person charged with employing plaintiff to ascertain the prevailing rate of wages for similar services in the city, and then to fix the compensation at that amount, or a still greater one, and by the section following the legislature undertook to assure such action by the officials commanded to fix wages at not less than the prevailing rate by providing that an official violating the provisions of the act would be guilty of malfeasance in office, and be suspended or removed.

We must assume—in view of the fact that the question arises from a demurrer to the complaint—that all of its allegations are true, and that the officer employing the plaintiff did not obey the statute, and hence became subject to its penalties. But that fact in no wise aids the plaintiff in his present contention. He had been in the employ of the city for some time prior to May 10, 1894—when the statute went into operation—at the rate of $3 a day, and that sum the city continued to pay, and he to receive without protest, for a period of six years. The prevailing rate of wages for that period was $3.50 a day, and the employing officer should have fixed plaintiff's wages at that sum or greater. But he did not do it, and while the plaintiff could have properly insisted that the officer should heed the command of the statute in that respect, he chose instead to continue in the service of the city without objecting to the compensation.

Now, "it is well settled by authority that a man may waive any right that he has, whether secured to him by contract, conferred on him by statute, or guaranteed him by the Constitution." (People ex rel. McLaughlin v. Bd. Police Comrs., 174 N. Y., 450, 456, and cases cited.) And the legal effect of plaintiff's action in accepting from time to time during a period of six years, without protest, the wages paid to him by the city, was to waive any claim that he might have had at the time to insist that the employing officer should fix his rate of compensation at a greater sum than he did.

It follows that plaintiff is not entitled to recover.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

APPENDIX C.

PEOPLE EX REL. TREAT VS. COLER, 166 NEW YORK, 144.

PARKER, Ch. J. (dissenting): I do not concur in the decision of the court, because:

1. The relator bound himself by an agreement, voluntarily entered into with the city of New York, to have the stone used on its work cut and dressed within the State of New York. He is not relieved from the performance of his agreement in that respect because the city insisted that unless he so agreed he could not obtain the contract, when it need not have so insisted, because there was no valid statute requiring it.

If it be true that section 14 of the labor law is unconstitutional, because in directing the city authorities to insert in the contract the cut-and-dressed-stone provision the legislature invades municipal rights and powers (which I still doubt), nevertheless the municipal authorities who were to determine what provisions should be incorporated into the contract were not bound to resist the statute on that ground, and might, as they did, heed its suggestions and give them effect. For if the right were theirs to determine the conditions of the agreement, without interference from the legislature, it was none the less their determination because some part of it was borrowed from a statute that they were not bound to heed. And it was just as much their determination as it would have been had some part of it been borrowed from the form of a contract employed by some other municipality that they could but need not follow. So, whether the contract was void or not, the municipal authorities had the power to insist, as they did, upon the conditions in controversy, and the contractor had the right to reject or accept the contract on those terms. He chose to accept, and he should now be held to this agreement as the other party to it demands.

2. Section 14 of the labor law does not violate the State constitution. My reasons for that position are sufficiently presented by the dissenting opinions in People ex rel. Rodgers v. Coler. (166 N. Y., 25, 41.)

3. Section 14 of the labor law is not in contravention of the Federal Constitution.

If that section sought to prevent the citizens of this State from using stone cut and dressed in another State, it would unquestionably offend against the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution and be void. But the statute does not attempt to interfere with the liberty of any citizen to have such stone as he may use cut and dressed where and by whom he shall choose. On the contrary, the statute is but an attempt on the part of a sovereign State to exercise the same function of choice in such regard as the Constitution secures to the citizen.

While the State can not say to the citizen that he must have the stone used in his residence cut and dressed within the State, neither the Federal nor State constitution prevent him from deciding that he will not build a residence unless the stone to be used in it are cut and dressed within the State, nor from incorporating into a contract with a builder a provision that unless every stone used in the structure be both cut and dressed within the State the contract shall be void and the contractor deprived of compensation.

But the liberty of contract with which the citizen is endowed is no greater than that with which the State is invested when it enters on a scheme of construction for the public good. If, as respects freedom of contract, all the people of the State acting together are not greater than one of the units—a citizen—they are at least as great and may be as capricious as it is possible for an individual to be touching the style of architecture, quality of materials, character of workmen, and rate of compensation that they will offer for work to be performed.

The legislature in a statute authorizing the construction of any public work may provide for every detail if it chooses, or it may delegate the whole or some part of the details to an agent or agency. But whichever method it may adopt the choice of materials and of men and the determination whether the work shall be done by day's work or by contract are the choice and determination of the sovereign—the people—speaking through their chosen representative—the legislature—upon which has been conferred every power and authority not expressly forbidden it by the constitution, including, therefore, necessarily, the power to determine whether in a public structure brick or stone shall be used, and if the latter, from what quarries they shall be taken, where cut and dressed, and by whom; and that is all that section 14 of the labor law seeks to accomplish.

It may not be wise for a legislature to thus discriminate as to its public work in favor of its own citizens, but whether it be or not the courts have no right to inquire, for they are without authority to correct a statute even if in their judgment it be founded on an erroneous view of sound principles of political economy. A statute is law, which the courts must both obey and administer unless it violates either the Federal or State constitution, in which event it is void, and as the courts decide what the law is, they may so declare. But when, as in this case, the statute complained of relates only to the administration of the business affairs of the State, it can not, I think, be said to offend against the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, for through it the legislature is but exercising the right of choice that belongs to the people as a whole as well as to the individual proprietor.

PARKER, Ch. J. (dissenting).

If the prevailing opinion correctly construes section 29, article 3, of the State constitution, the conclusion reached by it is well founded, for it has not been declared by the people of this State by an amendment to the organic law that the public welfare demands that free labor shall not be put in competition with prison labor. As construed, the provision was not intended to prevent dealing in any article of merchandise even if made by convicts in our own State prisons, but it "simply abolished what was known as the 'contract' system of labor in prisons, whereby the profits of the labor of convicts were secured by contractors or private parties."

I deem it safe to say that such a construction will surprise the members of the convention that recommended the constitution to the people for adoption as well as it will surprise the public at large, for the propriety and wisdom of the provision in question was the subject of much discussion in the public prints and elsewhere at the time of its submission to the people. On the one hand it was urged as most unjust that labor employed in manufacturing should be subjected to the competition of unpaid, compulsorily enforced labor, while on the other it was strenuously insisted that the burdens of the taxpayers should not be added to by restraining the convict from contributing in whole or in part to his own support.

That the provision has been heretofore read by those charged with the administration of the affairs of prisons and those engaged in a consideration of the question from the standpoint of public interest, according to the natural and ordinary meaning of the language employed, seems to me demonstrated by the opinion of Judge Bartlett. I shall, therefore, assume that the people of the State have forbidden the selling of articles manufactured in our prisons for the reason that they deemed it to be against a sound public policy to permit some of the citizens of the State skilled in certain kinds of labor to be subjected to competition with the unpaid labor of convicts.

It is now too late to consider the subject generally from the point of view of the political economist, for the people, in whom reside all power, have set at rest that question so far as this State is concerned. This statute neither prohibits nor attempts to prohibit other States, or the citizens of other States, from putting prison-made goods upon our markets; nor does it prohibit our own citizens from buying or selling them; if it did, then, concededly, the statute would be in violation of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution and void; it simply requires that prison-made merchandise shall be so branded that our citizens shall know where the goods they are buying were made.

This they have a right to know, for they voted to burden themselves with additional taxation rather than longer to permit a competition which they regarded as a public wrong, and they are, therefore, entitled to such legislation as will permit them to know the truth in regard to articles offered them for sale, in order that they may not, through lack of information, have forced upon them that which they would not buy advisedly. The commerce clause of the Federal Constitution does not stand in the way of their having such information, inasmuch as the constitution of this State establishes a public policy in the working out of which the legislature may go to this extent at least under the police power of the State.

The decisions of the United States Supreme Court in the oleomargarine and other cases, some of which are referred to in Judge Bartlett's opinion, furnish adequate support for that assertion. They establish, generally, that commerce between the States may be regulated to some extent under the police power of the State, which includes, among other things, efforts to prevent fraud and deception on purchasers. In view of the public policy declared by the people of this State through their constitution I am of the opinion that this statute is well within the police power of the State, and therefore, under the decision in the Slaughterhouse cases, not repugnant to the Federal Constitution.

I concur with Judge Bartlett for a reversal of the judgment.

APPENDIX E.

PEOPLE VS. LOCHNER, 177 NEW YORK, 145.

PARKER, Ch. J.: Defendant's conviction is under subdivision 3, section 384*l*, penal code, which makes a violation of Article VIII, chapter 415, laws 1897, a misdemeanor. The judgment is affirmed by the appellate division.

Defendant urges as ground for a reversal that Article VIII, which on its face purports to be, as we shall see later, an exercise of the police power of the State, offends against the first section of the fourteenth amendment to the United States Constitution. That section provides that "no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." It is also claimed that the statute violates those provisions of the State constitution which declare that "no member of this State shall be disfranchised or deprived of any of the rights or privileges secured to any citizen thereof, unless by the law of the land or the judgment of his peers" (Constitution, art. 1, sec. 1), "nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." (Constitution, art. 1, sec. 6.)

The first cases in which the fourteenth amendment is discussed by the United States Supreme Court are the Slaughterhouse cases (83 U. S., 36), wherein is challenged the Louisiana statute authorizing the removal of noxious slaughterhouses from the more densely populated part of New Orleans and their location where they could least affect the health and comfort of the people, and to that end granting a corporation exclusive right for twenty-five years to maintain slaughterhouses within three parishes, containing between 200,000 and 300,000 people, and including New Orleans. This is held to be a police regulation for the health and comfort of the people, and, therefore, within the power of the State legislature, and not affected by the fourteenth amendment, which the court says is not intended to interfere with the exercise of police power by the States.

In Barbier v. Connolly (113 U. S., 27) the Supreme Court has before it a San Francisco ordinance prohibiting work in public laundries within defined territory from 10 p. m. to 6 a. m., claimed to be repugnant to the fourteenth amendment. The court rules that the ordinance is well within the police power, and, in the course of the opinion, says: "Neither the amendment—broad and comprehensive as it is—nor any other amendment was designed to interfere with the power of the State, sometimes termed its police power, to prescribe regulations to promote the health, peace, morals, education, and good order of the people, and to legislate so as to increase the industries of the State, develop its resources, and add to its wealth and prosperity" (p. 31).

There are many interesting cases in the United States Supreme Court sustaining statutes of different States which in terms seem repugnant to the fourteenth amendment, but which that court declares to be within the police power of the States. Among them are statutes declaring a railroad company liable for damages to an employee although caused by another employee (127 U. S., 205); fixing the damages at double the value of stock killed, when due to the neglect of a railroad company to maintain fences (129 U. S., 26); requiring locomotive engineers to be licensed, and providing that the railroad company employing them pay the fees of examination (128 U. S., 96); requiring cars to be heated otherwise than by stoves on railroads over 50 miles in length (165 U. S., 628); providing for immediate payment of wages by railroad companies to discharged employees (173 U. S., 404); prohibiting options to sell grain (184 U. S., 425); providing for inspection of mines at expense of owners (185 U. S., 203), and one declaring void all contracts for sales of stocks on margins (187 U. S., 606).

I shall call special attention to but one other case, namely, Holden v. Hardy (169 U. S., 366). In that case the court reviews at length many of the cases arising under the fourteenth amendment, beginning with the Slaughterhouse cases. The case involves a Utah statute providing that "The period of employment of workingmen in all underground mines or workings shall be eight hours per day, except in cases of emergency where life or property is in imminent danger." Violation is made a misdemeanor. The conviction of one Holden under that statute is affirmed by the United States Supreme Court.

It is argued by defendant in that case that the statute has no relation to the health or safety of the public or the persons affected, or if so, only in a very remote degree, while its direct and principal effect is to interfere with the rights and liberties of the contracting parties; that the right to contract contains three essential and indispensable elements, guaranteed and protected by the United States Constitution, namely, "the right of the employer and employee to agree upon (1) the character of the service to be performed, (2) the amount to be paid for such service, and (3) the number of hours per day during which the service is to continue;" that the destruction or abridgment of one element is a destruction or abridgment of the whole of said right to contract; that the statute abridges the "privileges and immunities" in that it deprives the employer and the employee of perfect freedom and liberty to pursue unmolested a lawful vocation in a lawful manner; that the rights of the employer and employee in that direction were unlimited before the adoption of the fourteenth amendment, and that since its adoption it is beyond the power of any State to make any laws abridging or destroying such rights.

This latter contention—which if sustained would practically prevent all further development of the police power on the part of the States—is overborne by the court. Many cases passed upon by the court since the adoption of the fourteenth amendment are cited, furnishing illustrations tending to justify the boast of the devotees of the common law, that by the application of established legal principles the law has been and will continue to be developed from time to time so as to meet the ever-changing conditions of our widely diversified and rapidly developing business interests. The court quotes from Mr. Justice Matthews in Hurtado v. California (110 U. S., 516, 530): "This flexibility and capacity for growth and adaptation is the peculiar boast and excellence of the common law. * * * The Constitution of the United States was ordained, it is true, by descendants of Englishmen, who inherited the traditions of English law and history; but it was made for an undefined and expanding future and for a people gathered and to be gathered from many nations and of many tongues. * * * There is nothing in Magna Charta, rightly construed as a broad charter of public right and law, which ought to exclude the best ideas of all systems and of every age; and as it was the characteristic principle of the common law to draw its inspiration from every fountain of justice, we are not to assume that the sources of its supply have been exhausted. On the contrary, we shall expect that the new and various experiences of our own situation and system will mold and shape it into new and not less useful forms."

The court illustrates by forceful examples the necessity of recognizing in legal decisions the change of conditions. After calling attention to the fact that in the early history of the country there was no occasion for any special protection of a particular class, as we were almost purely an agricultural country, it instances coal mining and the manufacture of iron. When these industries began in Pennsylvania as early as 1716, they were carried on in such a limited way and by such primitive methods that no special laws were deemed necessary to protect operatives, but since that time they have assumed such vast proportions in that and other States, and developed so many dangers to the safety and life of those engaged in them, that laws to meet such exigencies have become necessary. It calls attention to many protective statutes enacted in many different States providing for fire escapes in hotels, theaters, factories, and other large buildings; inspection of boilers; appliances to obviate the dangers incident to railroad and steamboat transportation; the protection of dangerous machinery against accidental contact; the shoring up of ventilation shafts; means for signaling in mines for fresh air; the elimination as far as possible of dangerous gases, and safe means of hoisting and lowering employees in mines.

It is said that statutes providing such safeguards "have been repeatedly enforced by the courts of the several States; their validity assumed, and, so far as we are informed, they have been uniformly held to be constitutional" (169 U. S., 366, 394), which, of course, means that the courts of the several States making these decisions hold that such statutes do not deprive citizens of any of the rights or privileges guaranteed by the Constitution, nor deprive them of property without due process of law, for every State constitution contains such a provision or its equivalent. Of such illustrations the court further says (p. 387): "They are mentioned only for the purpose of calling attention to the probability that other changes of no less importance may be made in the future, and that while the cardinal principles of justice are immutable, the methods by which justice is administered are subject to constant fluctuation, and that the Constitution of the United States, which is necessarily and to a large extent inflexible and exceedingly difficult of amendment, should not be so construed as to deprive the States of the power to so amend their laws as to make them conform to the wishes of the citizens as they may deem best for the public welfare without bringing them into conflict with the supreme law of the land."

This broad-minded view—which is characteristic of the development of the law by this great court since the adoption of the fourteenth amendment—should, and doubtless will be followed by the courts of the several States whenever called upon to determine whether statutes offend against the provisions of State constitutions similar or equivalent to the provisions of the fourteenth amendment. The cases cited, and the reasoning of the court, to which but brief reference is made here, demonstrate that this statute does not offend against the fourteenth amendment, and it necessarily follows that it is not repugnant to equivalent provisions in our State constitution.

This court throughout all its history has maintained the same position as that taken by the United States Supreme Court. Many authorities could be cited in support of that assertion, but none need be, for they are all in one direction.

The impossibility of setting the bounds of the police power has up to this time prevented any court from attempting it, and the reason for it is well stated by Judge Gray in People v. Ewer (141 N. Y., 129, 132). He says: "It is difficult, if not impossible, to define the police power of a State, or, under recent judicial decisions, to say where the constitutional boundaries limiting its exercise are to be fixed. It is a power essential to be conceded to the State in the interest and for the welfare of its citizens. We may say of it that when its operation is in the direction of so regulating the use of private property or of so restraining personal action as manifestly to secure or to tend to the comfort, prosperity, or protection of the community no constitutional guaranty is violated, and the legislative authority is not transcended." In that case the constitutionality of section 292, Penal Code, is questioned. That section makes it a misdemeanor to exhibit as a dancer a female child under 14 years of age. The court denies that the statute violates our constitution because it deprives the mother, the person arrested, of the rights and privileges secured to her by the constitution.

In People ex rel. Nechamcus v. Warden, etc. (144 N. Y., 529), the constitutionality of chapter 602, Laws 1892, is challenged. The act provides for examination and registration of master plumbers, and makes it a misdemeanor for any person to engage in that trade without such registration. This court holds the statute to be within the police power of the legislature, and, therefore, not repugnant to the constitution. Judge Gray says, in the opinion (p. 535): "There has been much discussion upon the subject of what is a valid exercise of the police power of the State through legislative enactment, and there is little to be added to what this and other courts have said. The police power extends to the protection of persons and of property within the State. In order to secure that protection they may be subjected to restraints and burdens by legislative acts.

"If the act is a valid and reasonable exercise of the police power of the State, then it must be submitted to, as a measure designed for the protection of the public and to secure it against some danger, real or anticipated, from a state of things which modifications in our social or commercial life have brought about. The natural right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness is not an absolute right. It must yield whenever the concession is demanded by the welfare, health, or prosperity of the State. The individual must sacrifice his particular interest or desires if the sacrifice is a necessary one in order that organized society as a whole shall be benefited. That is a fundamental condition of the State, and which in the end accomplishes by reaction a general good, from which the individual must also benefit."

In Health Department v. Rector, etc. (145 N. Y., 32), the court considers a provision of the New York consolidation act requiring that tenement houses already erected shall be furnished by the owners with water, "whenever they shall be directed so to do by the board of health," "in sufficient quantity at one or more places on each floor, occupied or intended to be occupied by one or more families." The health department served a notice requiring defendant to supply water, as commanded by the statute, in buildings owned by it. Defendant refused to do so, and an action was brought by the health department to compel compliance. Defendant contends in that case that the statute violates that provision of the State constitution which declares that no member of this State shall "be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."

This court holds that the statute does not offend against the constitution, but that it is a valid exercise of the police power; that the legislature, by virtue of that power, can direct that improvements or alterations shall be made in existing houses at the owners' expense when it clearly appears that it tends in some plain and appreciable manner to guard and protect the public; and that a compensation need not be made to the owner in such case, the effect of the act being not to appropriate private property, but simply to regulate its use and enjoyment by the owner. Judge Peckham, writing the opinion of the court, says (p. 43): "Laws and regulations of a police nature, though they may disturb the enjoyment of individual rights, are not unconstitutional, though no provision is made for compensation for such disturbances. They do not appropriate private property for public use, but simply regulate its use and enjoyment by the owner."

People v. Havnor (149 N. Y., 195) is a case as near the border line, perhaps, as any to be found in this State—certainly very much nearer to it than the case under consideration. It exhaustively considers the authorities in this State bearing upon the police power. The case involves the constitutionality of what is known as the "Sunday barber law," which makes it a misdemeanor for any person to carry on the business or work of a barber on the first day of the week, except in the city of New York and the village of Saratoga, where such business or work may be carried on until 1 o'clock in the afternoon of that day. The statute is held to be constitutional, because a valid exercise of the police power. The opinion is written by Judge Vann. After a careful examination of the authorities, he presents the underlying question in this way (p. 201): "The vital question, therefore, is whether the real purpose of the statute under consideration has a reasonable connection with the public health, welfare, or safety."

After stating that the object of the act is to require the observance of Sunday, not as a holy day, but as a day of rest and recreation, he proceeds—with argument buttressed by authority in this State and in other jurisdictions—to answer the question in the affirmative. In the course of the argument he says (p. 203): "According to the common judgment of civilized men, public economy requires, for sanitary reasons, a day of general rest from labor, and the day naturally selected is that regarded as sacred by the greatest number of the citizens, as this causes the least inconvenience through interference with business. It is to the interest of the State to have strong, robust, healthy citizens, capable of self-support, of bearing arms, and of adding to the resources of the country. Laws to effect this purpose, by protecting the citizen from overwork and requiring a general day of rest to restore his strength and preserve his health, have an obvious connection with the public welfare. * * * The statute under discussion tends to effect this result, because it requires persons engaged in a kind of business that takes many hours each day to refrain from carrying it on during one day in seven. This affords an opportunity, recurring at regular intervals, for rest, needed both by the employer and the employed, and the latter at least may not have the power to observe a day of rest without the aid of legislation. * * * As barbers generally work more hours each day than most men the legislature may well have concluded that legislation was necessary for the protection of their health."

The pertinency and controlling force of that argument to the question under consideration here will be manifest when we come to an examination of the statute.

No authorities can be found in this court which conflict with the cases to which I have called attention. Rodgers's case (166 N. Y., 1) is cited in opposition, but why I can not see. The police power is not even considered in that case, the defense to that portion of the statute which is condemned as unconstitutional because it requires a stipulation in all contracts with the State and municipalities that the contractor shall "pay the prevailing rate of wages at least" being rested on the ground (1) that the State as proprietor can do what an individual proprietor can do, namely, insist upon any reasonable provision in a contract as a condition for doing the work; (2) that the State is proprietor not only as to contracts for work for the benefit of the entire State, but also as to contracts for work authorized by it for the various subdivisions of the State made for convenience of administration; (3) that hence it violates no provision of the constitution.

Having shown by an examination of a few of the leading authorities relating to the police power that the decisions of this court are in harmony with those of the United States Supreme Court, and having specially brought out some of the arguments in those decisions for the purpose of presenting something of the vast scope of that power, we come next to the question, In what spirit should the court approach the consideration of a statute said on the one hand to offend against the constitution and on the other to be a proper exercise of the police power?

The courts are frequently confronted with the temptation to substitute their judgment for that of the legislature. A given statute, though plainly within the legislative power, seems so repugnant to a sound public policy as to strongly tempt the court to set aside the statute, instead of waiting, as the spirit of our institutions require, until the people can compel their representatives to repeal the obnoxious statute.

In the early history of this country eminent writers gave expression to the fear that the power of the courts to set aside the enactments of the representatives chosen to legislate for the people would in the end prove a weak point in our governmental system, because of the difficulty of keeping the exercise of such great power within its legitimate bounds. So far in our judicial history it must be said that the courts have in the main been conservative in passing upon legislation attacked as unconstitutional, but occasionally, and especially when a case is one on the border line, it is quite possible that the judgment of the court that the legislation is unwise may operate to carry the decision to the wrong side of that border line. Certain it is that the courts have greatly extended their jurisdiction over many administrative acts that were originally supposed not to present cases for the court to pass upon, and in that way the courts have come to play a very important part in state and municipal administration. Some expression of our views on that subject is given in Matter of Guden (171 N. Y., 529, 535).

Now, when considering the mental attitude with which the court should begin an examination of this question, it is well to have in mind not only the great breadth and scope of the police power and the legislative control over it as expressed in some of the opinions from which we quote supra, but it is also well to have in mind some of the expressions of this court as to the way in which the court should approach the consideration of such a question as this, involving the constitutionality of a statute.

Judge Andrews says, in People v. King (110 N. Y., 418, 423): "By means of this power the legislature exercises a supervision over matters affecting the common weal. * * * It may be exerted whenever necessary to secure the peace, good order, health, morals, and general welfare of the community, and the propriety of its exercise within constitutional limits is purely a matter of legislative discretion with which courts can not interfere."

Judge Gray says, in Nechamcus's case (supra): "The courts should always assume that the legislature intended by its enactments to promote those ends [public health, comfort, and safety], and if the act admits of two constructions, that should be given to it which sustains it and makes it applicable in furtherance of the public interests." (144 N. Y., 529, 536.)

"Whether the legislation is wise is not for us to consider. The motives actuating and the inducements held out to the legislature are not the subject of inquiry by the courts, which are bound to assume that the lawmaking body acted with a desire to promote the public good. Its enactments must stand, provided always that they do not contravene the constitution, and the test of constitutionality is always one of power, nothing else. But in applying the test the courts must bear in mind that it is their duty to give the force of law to an act of the legislature whenever it can be fairly so construed and applied as to avoid conflict with the constitution." (Bohmer v. Haffen, 161 N. Y., 390, 399.)

Where there "is room for two constructions, both equally obvious and reasonable, the court must, in deference to the legislature of the State, assume that it did not overlook the provisions of the constitution, and designed the act * * * to take effect. Our duty, therefore, is to adopt the construction which, without doing violence to the fair meaning of the words used, brings the statute into harmony with the provisions of the constitution." (Supervisors v. Brodger, 112 U. S., 261, 268; People ex rel. Burrows v. Supervisors of Orange Co., 17 N. Y., 235, 241; People ex rel. Bolton v. Albertson, 55 N. Y., 50, 54; Matter of Gilbert El. Rwy. Co., 70 N. Y., 361, 367; Matter of N. Y. & L. I. Bridge Co. v. Smith, 148 N. Y., 540, 551.)

The court is inclined to so construe the statute as to validate it. (People v. Equitable Trust Co., 96 N. Y., 387, 394; People ex rel. Sinkler v. Terry, 108 N. Y., 1, 7; Matter of N. Y. El. R. R. Co., 70 N. Y., 327, 342; People ex rel. Killen v. Angle, 109 N. Y., 564, 567; Rogers v. Common Council of Buffalo, 123 N. Y., 173, 181; People ex rel. Carter v. Rice, 135 N. Y., 473, 484.)

"Every act of the legislature must be presumed to be in harmony with the fundamental law until the contrary is clearly made to appear." (People ex rel. Kemmler v. Durston, 119 N. Y., 569, 577.)

"Before an act of the legislature can be declared void as repugnant to the constitution the conflict must be manifest." (Matter of Stilwell, 139 N. Y., 337, 341.)

"If the act and the constitution can be so construed as to enable both to stand, and each can be given a proper and legitimate office to perform, it is the duty of the court to adopt such construction." (People v. Rosenberg, 138 N. Y., 410, 415.)

The statute under consideration in that case is held to be within the police power, as is the statute considered in the following case:

"It is not necessary to the validity of a penal statute that the legislature should declare on the face of the statute the policy or purpose for which it was enacted." (People v. West, 106 N. Y., 293, 297.)

Having considered the authorities bearing upon the subject of the exercise of police power at greater length than could be justified were it not for the different view that obtains in this court as to the authority of the legislature to pass the statute in question, and having glanced at a few authorities indicating the frame of mind in which the court should approach the consideration of the question of the constitutionality of an act of the legislature, we come to the consideration of the statute in question, aided by the principles established by the United States Supreme Court and the courts of this State, to which reference has been made.

I quote the whole statute, notwithstanding its length, in order that it may be at once determined, upon its mere reading, whether the purpose of the legislature was to subserve, in some measure, the public good under the police power of the State.

"ARTICLE VIII.—Bakeries and confectionery establishments.

"SEC. 110. Hours of labor in bakeries and confectionery establishments.—No employee shall be required or permitted to work in a biscuit, bread, or cake bakery, or confectionery establishment more than sixty hours in any one week or more than ten hours in any one day, unless for the purpose of making a shorter workday on the last day of the week, nor more hours in any one week than will make an average of ten hours per day for the number of days during such week in which such employee shall work.

"SEC. 111. Drainage and plumbing of buildings and rooms occupied by bakeries.—All buildings or rooms occupied as biscuit, bread, pie, or cake bakeries shall be drained and plumbed in a manner conducive to the proper and healthful sanitary condition thereof, and shall be constructed with air shafts, windows, or ventilating pipes sufficient to insure ventilation. The factory inspector may direct the proper drainage, plumbing, and ventilation of such rooms or buildings. No cellar or basement not now used for a bakery shall hereafter be so occupied or used unless the proprietor shall comply with the sanitary provisions of this article.

"SEC. 112. Requirements as to rooms, furniture, utensils, and manufactured products.—Every room used for the manufacture of flour or meal food products shall be at least 8 feet in height, and shall have, if deemed necessary by the factory inspector, an impermeable floor constructed of cement, or of tiles laid in cement, or an additional flooring of wood, properly saturated with linseed oil. The side walls of such rooms shall be plastered or wainscoted. The factory inspector may require the side walls and ceiling to be whitewashed at least once in three months. He may also require the woodwork of such walls to be painted. The furniture and utensils shall be so arranged as to be readily cleansed, and not prevent the proper cleaning of any part of the room. The manufactured flour or meal food products shall be kept in dry and airy rooms, so arranged that the floors, shelves, and other facilities for storing the same can be properly cleaned. No domestic animals, except cats, shall be allowed to remain in a room used as a biscuit, bread, pie, or cake bakery or any room in such bakery where flour or meal products are stored.

"SEC. 113. Wash rooms and closets; sleeping places.—Every such bakery shall be provided with a proper wash room and water-closet or water-closets apart from the bake room, or rooms where the manufacture of such food product is conducted, and no water-closet, earth closet, privy, or ash pit shall be within or connected directly with the bake room of any bakery, hotel, or public restaurant.

"No person shall sleep in a room occupied as a bake room. Sleeping places for the persons employed in the bakery shall be separate from the rooms where flour or meal food products are manufactured or stored. If the sleeping places are on the same floor where such products are manufactured, stored, or sold, the factory inspector may inspect and order them put in a proper sanitary condition.

"SEC. 114. Inspection of bakeries.—The factory inspector shall cause all bakeries to be inspected. If it be found upon such inspection that the bakeries so inspected are constructed and conducted in compliance with the provisions of this chapter, the factory inspector shall issue a certificate to the persons owning or conducting such bakeries.

"SEC. 115. Notice requiring alterations.—If, in the opinion of the factory inspector, alterations are required in or upon premises occupied and used as bakeries, in order to comply with the provisions of this article, a written notice shall be served by him upon the owner, agent, or lessee of such premises, either personally or by mail, requiring such alterations to be made within sixty days after such service, and such alterations shall be made accordingly."

That the public generally are interested in having bakers' and confectioners' establishments cleanly and wholesome in this day of appreciation of, and apprehension on account of, microbes, which cause disease and death, is beyond question. Not many years ago the baking was largely done in the family, but now in a large percentage of the houses in cities and villages the baker is relied on to a large extent to furnish bread, biscuits, cake, and pie, as well as confectionery, while over many country roads the bakers' wagons go twice a week or more to supply the farmers and inhabitants of small settlements with their wares. Indeed, it can be safely said that the family of to-day is more dependent upon the baker for the necessaries of life than upon any other source of supply.

That being so it is within the police power of the legislature to so regulate the conduct of that business as to best promote and protect the health of the people. And to that end the legislature undertakes to provide, by a statute which bears on its face evidence of an intelligent draftsman acquainted with the dangers of insanitary conditions in such establishments, for proper drainage and plumbing of the building and rooms occupied for such purpose.

Is there room to doubt that the sole purpose of the legislature in prohibiting the use of cellars for bakeries unless the occupant first complies with the sanitary provisions of this article is to protect the public from the use of the food made dangerous by the germs that thrive in darkness and uncleanness? Is it possible that anyone can question that the sole purpose of the legislature is the safeguarding of the public health when it provides for floors, ceilings, and side walls of such material as that they may be readily cleansed; compels the keeping of flour or meal food products in dry and airy rooms, so arranged that the storing facilities can be properly cleaned, and prohibits the keeping of domestic animals within such rooms?

And will anyone question the motive which induced the prohibition of a "water-closet, earth closet, privy, or ashpit * * * within or connected directly with the bake room of any bakery, hotel, or public restaurant?" If not, why should anyone question the object of the legislature in providing in the same article and as a part of the scheme that "no employee shall be required or permitted to work" in such an establishment "more than sixty hours in any one week," an average of ten hours for each working day. It is but reasonable to assume from this statute as a whole that the legislature had in mind that the health and cleanliness of the workers, as well as the cleanliness of the workrooms, was of the utmost importance, and that a man is more likely to be careful and cleanly when well, and not overworked, than when exhausted by fatigue, which makes for careless and slovenly habits, and tends to dirt and disease.

If there is opportunity—and who can doubt it—for this view, then the legislature had the power to enact as it did, and the courts are bound to sustain its action as justified by the police power, as we see from the authorities referred to earlier in this opinion.

I hear but one argument advanced for the purpose of convincing the mind that the object of this statute is not to protect the public, and that argument is that Article VIII is to be found in the labor law. Therefore it is said it is a labor law, not a health law.

The question presented by that argument is, Does the label or the body of the statute prevail? Does calling a statute names deprive it of its intended and real character? If a statute relating principally to banking happens, in the course of codification, to be incorporated as an article in the general corporation law, does it cease to operate on the banking business? I submit without argument that the questions answer themselves.

Assuming, however, for the purpose of argument only, that the label is of such substantial importance that it may be accepted as against the obvious meaning of the statute, then I say that Article VIII bears its own title, which is: "Bakeries and confectionery establishments." All that is contained in that article relates to bakeries and confectionery establishments and their conduct, and to no other subject whatever. Therefore it is fully, appropriately, and harmoniously entitled.

Again, inasmuch as it is obvious, as we have seen, from a mere reading of the statute, that the legislative purpose is to benefit the public, we must assume—even if the object of the legislature in limiting the hours of work of employees is not to protect the health of the general public, who take the wares made by such employees—that the legislature intends to protect the health of the employees in such establishments; that, for some reason sufficient to it, it has reached the conclusion that in work of this character men ought not to be employed more than an average of ten hours a day. Now, that being so—and certainly no more restricted view of that statute can be taken by those who would destroy it—we find that the action of the legislature is within the police power not only under the authorities of the United States, but of this State and of this court.

Special attention has already been called to Holden's case (169 U. S., 366). A Utah statute making it a misdemeanor to employ a man more than eight hours per day in "underground mines or workings" is sustained, and a conviction thereunder upheld by the United States Supreme Court, on the ground that it is within the police power of the State to pass such a statute. That interesting case—to which I have made extended reference supra—is in point and controlling so far as the fourteenth amendment is concerned, and should be controlling in this court so far as equivalent provisions of our State constitution are concerned.

It must also be held, under the authority of Havnor's case (supra)—even though it may be assumed from the reading of the statute that the object of the legislature is to protect employees in such establishments from working more than ten hours a day—that it is within the police power, and therefore not repugnant to the State constitution. The statute which that case passes upon makes it a misdemeanor to carry on the business of a barber on the first day of the week, and a judgment of conviction under that law is affirmed in this court because "The statute under consideration has a reasonable connection with the public health, welfare, or safety." Certainly if this court could so hold in that case, it must so hold in this, even under the construction of the statute which those would give to it who are affected by the fact that Article VIII, chapter 32, general laws, is grouped with twelve other articles, the compilation being known as the "labor law," instead of being in the domestic law with articles entitled "flour and meal," "beef and pork," or in the public health law with articles such as "adulteration," "practice of medicine," or the like.

Again, many medical authorities classify workers in bakers' or confectioners' establishments with potters, stonecutters, file grinders, and other workers whose occupation necessitates the inhalation of dust particles, and hence predisposes its members to consumption. The published medical opinions and vital statistics bearing upon that subject standing alone fully justify the section under review as one to protect the health of the employees in such establishments, and it is the duty of this court to assume that the section was framed not only in the light of but also with full appreciation of the force of the medical authority bearing upon the subject—authority which reasonably challenges the attention and stimulates the helpfulness of the philanthropist.

The conclusion necessarily follows, therefore, from an examination of the statute in the light of the authorities cited, that the purpose of Article VIII, and every part of it, including the provision in question, is to benefit the public; that it has a just and reasonable relation to the public welfare, and hence is within the police power possessed by the legislature. But if, in violation of the duty of the court, as stated in Brodger's case (supra)—which is "to adopt the construction which, without doing violence to the fair meaning of the words used, brings the statute into harmony with the provisions of the constitution"—we award to the title of a general law such potency as causes it to overcome both the title and the provisions of an article therein, thus making the provision a labor law, we are still required to hold that it is within the police power.

The judgment should be affirmed.

APPENDIX F.

NATIONAL PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION VS. CUMMING, 170 NEW YORK, 315.

PARKER, Ch. J.: The order of the appellate division should be affirmed, on the ground that the facts found do not support the judgment of the special term. In the discussion of that proposition I shall assume that certain principles of law laid down in the opinion of Judge Vann are correct, namely:

"It is not the duty of one man to work for another unless he has agreed to, and if he has so agreed, but for no fixed period, either may end the contract whenever he chooses. The one may work, or refuse to work, at will, and the other may hire or discharge at will. The terms of employment are subject to mutual agreement, without let or hindrance from anyone.

"If the terms do not suit or the employer does not please, the right to quit is absolute, and no one may demand a reason therefor. Whatever one man may do alone he may do in combination with others, provided they have no unlawful object in view. Mere numbers do not ordinarily affect the quality of the act. Workingmen have the right to organize for the purpose of securing higher wages, shorter hours of labor, or improving their relations with their employers. They have the right to strike—that is, to cease working in a body by prearrangement until a grievance is redressed, provided the object is not to gratify malice or inflict injury upon others, but to secure better terms of employment for themselves. A peaceable and orderly strike, not to harm others, but to improve their own condition, is not in violation of law."

Stated in other words, the propositions quoted recognize the right of one man to refuse to work for another on any ground that he may regard as sufficient, and the employer has no right to demand a reason for it. But there is, I take it, no legal objection to the employee's giving a reason, if he has one, and the fact that the reason given is that he refuses to work with another who is not a member of his organization, whether stated to his employer or not, does not affect his right to stop work, nor does it give a cause of action to the workman to whom he objects because the employer sees fit to discharge the man objected to rather than lose the services of the objector.

The same rule applies to a body of men who, having organized for purposes deemed beneficial to themselves, refuse to work. Their reasons may seem inadequate to others, but if it seems to be in their interest as members of an organization to refuse longer to work, it is their legal right to stop. The reason may no more be demanded, as a right, of the organization than of an individual, but if they elect to state the reason their right to stop work is not cut off because the reason seems inadequate or selfish to the employer or to organized society. And if the conduct of the members of an organization is legal in itself, it does not become illegal because the organization directs one of its members to state the reason for its conduct.

The principles quoted above recognize the legal right of members of an organization to strike—that is, to cease working in a body by prearrangement until a grievance is redressed, and they enumerate some things that may be treated as the subject of a grievance, namely, the desire to obtain higher wages, shorter hours of labor, or improved relations with their employers; but this enumeration does not, I take it, purport to cover all the grounds which will lawfully justify members of an organization refusing, in a body and by prearrangement, to work. The enumeration is illustrative rather than comprehensive, for the object of such an organization is to benefit all its members and it is their right to strike, if need be, in order to secure any lawful benefit to the several members of the organization, as, for instance, to secure the reemployment of a member they regard as having been improperly discharged, and to secure from an employer of a number of them employment for other members of their organization who may be out of employment, although the effect will be to cause the discharge of other employees who are not members.

And whenever the courts can see that a refusal of members of an organization to work with nonmembers may be in the interest of the several members, it will not assume, in the absence of a finding to the contrary, that the object of such refusal was solely to gratify malice and to inflict injury upon such nonmembers.

A number of reasons for the action of the organization will at once suggest themselves in a case like this. One reason apparent from the findings in this case, as I shall show later, is the desire of the organization that its own members may do the work the nonmembers are performing. And another most important reason is suggested by the fact that these particular organizations, associations of steam fitters, required every applicant for membership to pass an examination testing his competency. Now, one of the objections sometimes urged against labor organizations is that unskillful workmen receive as large compensation as those thoroughly competent. The examination required by the defendant associations tends to do away with the force of that objection as to them. And, again, their restriction of membership to those who have stood a prescribed test must have the effect of securing careful as well as skillful associates in their work, and that is a matter of no small importance in view of the state of the law, which absolves the master from liability for injuries sustained by a workman through the carelessness of a coemployee.

So long as the law compels the employee to bear the burden of the injury in such cases it can not be open to question but that a legitimate and necessary object of societies like the defendant associations would be to assure the lives and limbs of their members against the negligent acts of a reckless coemployee, and hence it is clearly within the right of an organization to provide such a method of examination and such tests as will secure a careful and competent membership, and to insist that protection of life and limb requires that they shall not be compelled to work with men whom they have not seen fit to admit into their organization, as happened in the case of the plaintiff McQueed.

While I purpose to take the broader ground, which I deem fully justified by the principles quoted, as well as the authorities, that the defendants had the right to strike for any reason they deemed a just one, and further, had the right to notify their employer of their purpose to strike, I am unable to see how it is possible to deny the right of these defendant organizations and their members to refuse to work with nonmembers, when, in the event of injury by the carelessness of such coemployees, the burden would have to be borne by the injured, without compensation from the employer and with no financial responsibility, as a general rule, on the part of those causing the injury; for it is well known that some men, even in the presence of danger, are perfectly reckless of themselves and careless of the rights of others, with the result that accidents are occurring almost constantly which snuff out the lives of workmen as if they were candles, or leave them to struggle through life maimed and helpless. These careless, reckless men are known to their associates, who not only have the right to protect themselves from such men, but, in the present state of the law, it is their duty, through their organizations, to attempt to do it as to the trades affording special opportunities for mischief arising from recklessness.

I know it is said in another opinion in this case that "workmen can not dictate to employers how they shall carry on their business, nor whom they shall or shall not employ;" but I dissent absolutely from that proposition, and assert that, so long as workmen must assume all the risk of injury that may come to them through the carelessness of coemployees, they have the moral and legal right to say that they will not work with certain men, and the employer must accept their dictation or go with out their services.

If it be true, as was recently intimated by the supreme court of Pennsylvania in Durkin v. Kingston Coal Company (171 Pa. St., 193), that an act of the legislature which undertakes to "reverse the settled law upon the subject and declare that the employer shall be responsible for an injury to an employee resulting from the negligence of a fellow-workman" is unconstitutional—a doctrine from which I dissent (see Tullis v. L. Erie & W. R. R. Co., 175 U. S., 348), but which it is possible may receive the support of the courts—then the only opportunity for protection, in the future as well as the present, to workmen engaged in dangerous occupations is through organizations like these defendant associations, which restrict their memberships to careful and skillful men and prohibit their members from working with members of other organizations which maintain a lower standard or none at all. For the master's duty is discharged if the workman be competent, and for his recklessness, which renders his employment a menace to others, the master is not responsible.

But I shall not further pursue this subject. My object in alluding to it is to emphasize the fact that there are other purposes for which labor organizations can be effectually used than those quoted above; and also, because it is fairly inferable from the facts found that the members of plaintiff association were objectionable to defendants because not up to the latter's standards, so as to make them eligible for membership in defendant organizations, and that this was the motive for defendants' acts in holding a strike and notifying their employer of their intention to do so. But whether this be so or not, when it can be seen from the facts found that such or other motives of advantage to themselves may have prompted defendants' action, a court which can review only upon the law certainly will not presume that another and an unlawful motive and one not stated in the findings of fact, prompted the action of the organization and its members. In other words, this court can not import into the findings of fact a fact that is not therein expressed. This is not a case of unanimous affirmance, but one of reversal, and under section 1338 of the code of civil procedure we are to assume that the appellate division intended to affirm the facts as found by the trial court, and having so affirmed them it then reversed because they were insufficient in law to support the judgment. It is our duty, therefore, if we discover that the facts as actually found are insufficient to support the conclusion of law, to sustain the action of the appellate division in reversing the judgment. (Nat. Harrow Co. v. Bement & Sons, 163 N. Y., 505, and cases cited.)

In Bowen v. Matheson (14 Allen, 499) the court had before it on demurrer a declaration in an action where the defendants' business had been practically broken up, and it said: "In order to be good the declaration must allege against the defendants the commission of illegal acts. Its allegations must be analyzed to ascertain whether they contain a sufficient statement of such acts." This was followed by an interesting analysis which resulted in disclosing that no illegal act was alleged notwithstanding the liberal use of such extravagant words and phrases as "maliciously conspiring together," and "fellow-conspirators as aforesaid in pursuance of their conspiracy as aforesaid," whereupon the demurrer was sustained and a precedent created which should be followed in this case.

Now, before taking up the findings of fact for analysis in the light of the principles quoted above, as was done in Bowen's case, and with the view of showing that they do not sustain the judgment of the special term, I wish to again call attention to the rules quoted, and particularly to so much of them as intimates that if the motive be unlawful or be not for the good of the organization or some of its members, but prompted wholly by malice and a desire to injure others, then an act, which would be otherwise legal, becomes unlawful.

To state it concretely, if an organization strikes to help its members, the strike is lawful. If its purpose be merely to injure nonmembers, it is unlawful. If the organization notifies the employer that its members will not work with nonmembers, and its real object is to benefit the organization and secure employment for its members, it is lawful. If its sole purpose be to prevent nonmembers working, then it is unlawful. I do not assent to this proposition, although there is authority for it. It seems to me illogical and little short of absurd to say that the every-day acts of the business world, apparently within the domain of competition, may be either lawful or unlawful according to the motive of the actor. If the motive be good, the act is lawful; if it be bad, the act is unlawful. Within all the authorities upholding the principle of competition, if the motive be to destroy another's business in order to secure business for yourself the motive is good; but, according to a few recent authorities, if you do not need the business or do not wish it then the motive is bad, and some court may say to a jury, who are generally the triers of fact, that a given act of competition which destroyed A's business was legal if the act was prompted by a desire on the part of the defendant to secure to himself the benefit of it, but illegal if its purpose was to destroy A's business in revenge for an insult given.

But for the purpose of this discussion I shall assume this proposition to be sound, for it is clear to me that, applying that rule to the facts found, it will appear that the appellate division order should be sustained.

While I shall consider every fact found by the learned trial judge, I shall consider the findings in a different order, because it seems to me the more logical order. He finds "that the defendants Cumming and Nugent, while acting in their capacity of walking delegates for their respective associations and members of the board of delegates, caused the plaintiff McQueed and other members of the plaintiff association to be discharged by their employers from various pieces of work upon buildings in the course of erection * * * by threatening the * * * employers that if they did not discharge the members of the plaintiff association and employ the members of the Enterprise and Progress associations in their stead, the said walking delegates would cause a general strike of all men of other trades employed on said buildings, and that the defendant Cumming, as such walking delegate, did cause strikes, * * * in order to prevent the members of the plaintiff association from continuing with the work they were doing at the time the strike was ordered, and that said employers, by reason of said threats and the acts of the defendants Cumming and Nugent, discharged the members of the plaintiff association and employed the members of the Enterprise and Progress associations in their stead."

Now, there is not a fact stated in that finding which is not lawful within the rules which I have quoted supra. Those principles concede the right of an association to strike in order to benefit its members; and one method of benefiting them is to secure them employment, a method conceded to be within the right of an organization to employ. There is no pretense that the defendant associations or their walking delegates had any other motive than one which the law justifies of attempting to benefit their members by securing their employment. Nowhere throughout that finding will be found even a hint that a strike was ordered or a notification given of the intention to order a strike for the purpose of accomplishing any other result than that of securing the discharge of the members of the plaintiff association and the substitution of members of the defendant associations in their place. Such a purpose is not illegal within the rules laid down in the opinion of Judge Vann, nor within the authorities cited therein; on the contrary, such a motive is conceded to be a legal one. It is only where the sole purpose is to do injury to another, or the act is prompted by malice, that it is insisted that the act becomes illegal. No such motive is alleged in that finding. It is not hinted at. On the contrary, the motive which always underlies competition is asserted to have been the animating one.

It is beyond the right and the power of this court to import into that finding, in contradiction of another finding or otherwise, the further finding that the motive which prompted the conduct of defendants was an unlawful one, prompted by malice and a desire to do injury to plaintiffs without benefiting the members of the defendant associations.

I doubt if it would ever have occurred to anyone to claim that there was anything in that finding importing a different motive from that specially alleged in the finding had not the draftsman characterized the notice given to the employers by the associations of their intention to strike as "threats."

The defendant associations, as appears from the finding quoted, wanted to put their men in the place of certain men at work who were nonmembers working for smaller pay, and they set about doing it in a perfectly lawful way. They determined that if it were necessary they would bear the burden and expense of a strike to accomplish that result, and in so determining they were clearly within their rights, as all agree. They could have gone upon a strike without offering any explanation until the contractors should have come in distress to the officers of the associations asking the reason for the strike. Then, after explanations, the nonmembers would have been discharged and the men of defendant associations sent back to work. Instead of taking that course, they chose to inform the contractors of their determination and the reason for it.

It is the giving of this information, a simple notification of their determination, which it was right and proper and reasonable to give, that has been characterized as "threats" by the special term, and which has led to no inconsiderable amount of misunderstanding since. But the sense in which the word was employed by the court is of no consequence, for the defendant associations had the absolute right to threaten to do that which they had a right to do. Having the right to insist that plaintiff's men be discharged and defendants' men put in their place if the services of the other members of the organization were to be retained, they also had the right to threaten that none of their men would stay unless their members could have all the work there was to do.

The findings further stated that the defendants, Cumming and Nugent, were the walking delegates of the defendant associations, and as such were members of the board of delegates of the building trades in New York, and were therefore in control of the matters in their respective trades. The trial court also found "that the defendant, Cumming, threatened to cause a general strike against the plaintiff association and against the plaintiff, McQueed wherever he found them at work, and that he would not allow them to work at any job in the city of New York, except some small jobs where the men of the Enterprise Association were not employed, and that he and the defendant, Nugent, threatened to drive the plaintiff association out of existence."

Now, this finding should be read in connection with and in the light of, the other findings which I have already read and commented on and which show that the purpose of the strike was to secure the employment of members of the defendant associations in the places filled by the members of plaintiff's association, who were willing to work for smaller wages, a perfectly proper and legitimate motive, as we have seen. But if the other findings be driven from the mind while considering this one, which the opinions of the appellate division indicate was not justified by the evidence, it will be found that it fairly means no more than that the defendant associations did not purpose to allow McQueed and the members of his association to work upon any jobs where members of defendant associations were employed; that they were perfectly willing to allow them to have small jobs, fitted perhaps for men who were willing to work for small wages, but that the larger jobs, where they could afford to pay and would pay the rate of wages demanded by defendant associations, they intended to secure for their members alone—a determination to which they had a perfect right to come, as is conceded by the rules which I have quoted.

Having reached that conclusion, defendants notified McQueed, who had organized an association when he failed to pass the defendants' examination, that they would prevent him and the men of his association from working on a certain class of jobs. They did not threaten to employ any illegal method to accomplish that result; they notified them of the purpose of the defendants to secure this work for themselves and to prevent McQueed and his associates from getting it, and in doing that they but informed them of their intention to do what they had a right to do, and when a man purposes to do something which he has the legal right to do there is no law which prevents him from telling another, who will be affected by his act, of his intention.

A man has a right under the law to start a store and to sell at such reduced prices that he is able in a short time to drive the other storekeepers in his vicinity out of business, when, having possession of the trade, he finds himself soon able to recover the loss sustained while ruining the others. Such has been the law for centuries. The reason, of course, is that the doctrine has generally been accepted that free competition is worth more to society than it costs, and that, on this ground, the infliction of damages is privileged. (Commonwealth v. Hunt, 4 Metcalf, 111, 134.)

Nor could this storekeeper be prevented from carrying out his scheme because, instead of hiding his purpose, he openly declared to those storekeepers that he intended to drive them out of business in order that he might later profit thereby. Nor would it avail such storekeepers, in the event of their bringing an action to restrain him from accomplishing their ruin by underselling them, to persuade the trial court to characterize the notification as a "threat," for on review the answer would be: A man may threaten to do that which the law says he may do, provided that, within the rules laid down in those cases, his motive is to help himself.

A labor organization is endowed with precisely the same legal right as is an individual to threaten to do that which it may lawfully do.

Having finished the discussion of the facts, I reiterate that, within the rules of law I have quoted, it must appear, in order to make out a cause of action against these defendants, that in what they did they were actuated by improper motives, by a malicious desire to injure the plaintiffs. There is no such finding of fact, and there is no right in this court to infer it if it would, and from the other facts found it is plain that it should not if it could.

The findings conclude with a sentence which commences as follows: "I find that the threats made by the defendants and the acts of the said walking delegates in causing the discharge of the members of the plaintiff association by means of threats of a general strike of other workmen constituted an illegal combination and conspiracy." That is not a finding of fact, but a conclusion of law, that the trial court erroneously, as I think, attempted to draw from the facts found, which I have already discussed, and which clearly, in my judgment, require this court to hold that the defendants acted within their legal rights.

In the last analysis of the findings, therefore, it appears that they declare that members of the organizations refused to work any longer (as they lawfully might); that they threatened to strike (which was also within their lawful right), but without any suggestion whatever in the findings that they threatened an illegal or unlawful act. And such findings are claimed to be sufficient to uphold a judgment that absolutely enjoins the defendant associations and their members from striking. This is certainly a long step in advance of any decision brought to my attention.

I have refrained from discussing the authorities because it seemed unnecessary, for the reason already stated in this opinion. But it seems not out of place to suggest that the decisions of the English courts upon questions affecting the rights of workmen ought, at least, to be received with caution, in view of the fact that the later ones are largely supported by early precedents which were entirely consistent with the policy of the statute law of England, but are hostile not only to the statute law of this country, but to the spirit of our institutions. In support of this view reference to a few early statutes of England will be made.

The statutes (for there are two) of laborers, passed in 1349 and 1350 (22 Ewd. III, and 25 Edw. III, st. 1) provided "that every man and woman of what condition he be, free or bound, able in body, and within the age of three score years," and not having means of his own, "if he in convenient service (his estate considered) be required to serve, he shall be bounden to serve him which so shall him require." And the statutes provide that in case of refusal to serve punishment by imprisonment might be inflicted, and that the laborer should take the customary rate of wages and no more. These statutes not only regulated the wages of laborers and mechanics, but they confined them to their existing places of residence and required them to swear to obey the provisions of the statutes. Sir James Fitzjames Stephen, in his History of the Criminal Law of England (Vol. III, p. 294), says: "The main object of these statutes was to check the rise in wages consequent upon the great pestilence called the 'black death.'"

Nearly two hundred years later, and in 1548, a more general statute was passed which forbade all conspiracies and covenants of artificers, workmen, or laborers, "not to make or do their work but at a certain price or rate," or for other similar purposes, under the penalty on a third conviction of the pillory and loss of an ear, and to "be taken as a man 'infamous.'" (2 and 3 Edw. VI, c. 15.)

Fourteen years later the prior statutes were to some extent amended and consolidated into a longer act, entitled "An act containing divers orders for artificers, laborers, servants of husbandry, and apprentices." It provided in effect that all persons able to work as laborers or artificers and not possessed of independent means or other employments are bound to work as artificers or laborers on demand. The hours of work are fixed; power is given to the justices in their next session after Easter to fix the wages to be paid to mechanics and laborers; elaborate rules are laid down as to apprenticeship, and it further provides that for the future no one is to "set up, occupy, use, or exercise any craft, mystery, or occupation now used" until he has served an apprenticeship of seven years. (5 Eliz., c. 4.) This statute remained in force practically for a long period of time and was not formally repealed until the year 1875.

In the year 1720 an act was passed declaring all agreements between journeymen tailors "for advancing their wages or for lessening their usual hours of work" to be null and void, and subjecting persons entering into such an agreement to imprisonment with or without hard labor for two months. (7 Geo. I, st. 1, c. 13.) Similar enactments were passed as to employees in other manufactures and trades.

The act of 1800 (40 Geo. III, c. 60) provided for a penalty of three months' imprisonment without hard labor or two months with hard labor for every journeyman, workman, or other person who "enters into any combination to obtain an advance of wages, or lessen or alter the hours of work, * * * or who hinders any employer from employing any person as he thinks proper, or who, being hired, refuses without any just or reasonable cause to work with any other journeyman or workman employed or hired to work."

The same penalty is inflicted upon persons who attend meetings held for the purpose of collecting money to further such effort, and the act also makes it an offense to assist in maintaining men who are on strike. This statute, as well as the others referred to, have at last been swept away, but necessarily their influence has been not inconsiderable in shaping the decisions of the courts of England.

The order should be affirmed and judgment absolute ordered for defendants on the plaintiffs' stipulation with costs.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I take occasion to give my unreserved approval of the bill making appropriations for the Post-Office Department, and I do so with the greatest pleasure.

I said "my unreserved approval," but I ought to qualify that statement a little. I approve of the bill heartily, but with the reservation that I wish the appropriations were even larger and more liberal than they are for certain items, which I shall particularize and dwell upon further as I proceed with my remarks.

First of all, I wish to say a word in regard to the minority report accompanying the bill. I concur fully in the views of the minority as expressed in this report. I knew what it contained, and it was my intention to sign the report; but it so happened that I was not at the Capitol when the document was made ready to send to the printer, so my signature thereto is absent; but I wish it understood by all that the absence was accidental.

As will be seen by all who read the minority report, that document raises no objections against the pending bill itself. It criticises none of the branches of the service and recommends no decreases in any of the items. It simply deplores the prevailing methods of administration in the Department, whereby it has come to pass that Congress has no knowledge and can get no knowledge, at first hand, as to the proper cost of the various arms of the service, but has to take the word of the Department officials for it, thus becoming merely a collection of clerks for carrying out the propositions of the Department chiefs.

Coming now to the bill itself, I repeat that I consider it a meritorious, well-balanced measure in the main, though I could have wished, and do wish, that larger provisions had been made for certain objects. The rural free-delivery service is well provided for, which is very right and proper; but I regret that the claims of the city letter carriers did not receive somewhere near proportionate recognition. The appropriation mentioned for the rural service shows an increase over last year of 34½ per cent; that for the letter carriers only 6 per cent. The appropriation for clerks in the first and second class offices is increased 10 per cent. This is also very right and well deserved, and I am glad of it; but the letter carriers certainly deserve fully as well as the indoor clerks.

There are no members of the postal service, unless perhaps the railway mail agents, who face so much danger and discomfort and who work so hard for the public good as the letter carriers. The rural-route agent has to face storms too, but he does it in a wagon, and the letter carrier does it on foot. In the coldest weather the letter carrier can not wear thick, warm gloves—they interfere with his handling of the mail. In the slipperiest walking he must push ahead at any risk, and cover his rounds on time.

The great benefit the letter carriers render to the community is pretty well understood and appreciated in a general way, but the service is underpaid, and the salaries ought to be materially increased, yet the present bill does not increase the salaries at all. The increase of 6 per cent in the gross appropriation for this branch of the service is simply to provide for its further extension over a wider field. Five hundred thousand dollars is appropriated for the increase of salaries of the post-office clerks, which is meritorious.

A letter carrier has to act as substitute—or "sub," as they call it—for two years before he can get an appointment. During this preliminary period he makes about $25 a month. The first year of his regular appointment he receives $600; the second year, $800; the third year, $1,000. This makes four years he has to work, at about an average of $625 a year, before reaching the princely salary of $1,000—and even that much too small, as we must all agree. In some instances he has to "sub" for three or four years.

Moreover, the letter carriers must be men of the highest character and of a superior order of intelligence, the very kind of men who usually receive the highest grades of salaries in general business concerns. Many of them are married and have to support a family, in these expensive times, by hard, exhausting, responsible labor on $1,000 a year! I respectfully submit, without further argument, that it is about time for Congress to take some suitable action for the benefit of the letter carriers of this country.

One other matter I wish to allude to specially, and then I will trespass no longer upon the valuable time of the committee. That matter is the pneumatic-tube service. This, Mr. Chairman, I am fully convinced is one of the most valuable adjuncts of the postal service ever invented. Last year $800,000 was appropriated for this object, of which it is understood there is a large unexpended balance on hand, so that the Post-Office Committee felt that a further allowance of $500,000 for the next year would be sufficient. I trust that it may be found so, and that nothing may happen to cripple this great benefit to the people or tend to retard its extension.

In all our large cities, covering wide expanses of territory under one municipality, the pneumatic-tube mail service has proved the only satisfactory solution of the problem of how to practically annihilate time and space. Mail wagons, hurried forward by the swiftest horses and driven by the most expert drivers, have been tried and found wanting. So have the electric street cars. So have the elevated railroads. They all can go just so fast and no faster, and they all are in constant danger of getting blockaded.

The pneumatic tubes do reduce to a minimum the time and labor of conveying mail matter from one point to another in a city. They are a great success, and they should be extended rapidly and on a liberal scale in all our large cities, where they should be connected with every railroad station so as to facilitate and accelerate the transmission of all outgoing and incoming mails. This is a practical suggestion, the adoption of which would cost little and would benefit the community enormously. I trust it may be acted upon favorably by Congress and the postal authorities without any needless delay. It is especially needed in New York and Brooklyn, but would no doubt be welcomed in Chicago, Boston, St. Louis, and many other large cities.

This extension of the pneumatic-tube service should be no mere bagatelle. It should not mean merely the conveyance of a few special-delivery or registered letters. It should be developed into a great, comprehensive mail-transportation system, carrying, if not all the mail matter, at least all the letters between the main office in a city and all the branch offices, and also, as I have said, to and from the railroad stations. The last-named feature is in reality the most important of all. The fast mail from the West, we will say, is drawing into the railroad terminal at New York. It has four or five mail cars full of mail matter. The bulk of the first-class mail is made up of business letters to New York and Brooklyn firms from correspondents in Chicago, St. Louis, Milwaukee, San Francisco, and all over the West, and also from the Philippines, China, and Japan. The postal clerks on the train, we will suppose, have made up the letters into bunches of suitable size and shape for transmission by pneumatic tube. If so transmitted they will have reached the main office, three miles away, in less time than it takes to tell about it. The bundles for Brooklyn will also reach as quickly the main office in that borough, five miles away, and across a river at that.

By such transportation a delay of at least half an hour in the case of New York and an hour in the case of Brooklyn is obviated. Millions of dollars' worth of business is consequent upon this single day's mail. In many of the transactions the utmost haste is requisite. Every hour, every minute, is precious. The hour gained by the pneumatic tube may be of great importance to the merchant receiving the early order, by reason of its enabling him to fill the order in time for shipment the same day, and saving thereby perhaps twelve or twenty-four hours' time. In like manner, by means of the pneumatic tube in connection with the outgoing mails, the hour for closing mails at the main office and branch offices can be postponed, and this, too, will add much valuable time to the day of the business man.

I trust that within a few years this pneumatic-tube service may be as completely organized and universally used in our cities as the telephone service, with which it will vie in usefulness; and I would be very glad to see the appropriation for this purpose materially increased in the present bill, and the appropriation for the letter carriers as well. [Loud applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CROMER].

[Mr. CROMER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS] one hour or such time as he may desire.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I am going to submit to this imposing array of empty chairs a few remarks on the post-office appropriation bill and on some other questions connected with the administration of the Post-Office Department, simply because it is easier to stand here and talk it than it is to sit down and write it and put it in the RECORD.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CROMER] who has just taken his seat criticises quite severely the report of the Post-Office Committee, which proposes to increase the salary of the letter carriers to the extent of $120 a year, because, in his opinion, this increase is not a sufficient return to them for the labor they perform as such carriers. In reply to that, it is a truth which no gentleman here can or will attempt to deny that the proposed salary of $720 for rural carriers is a larger income than the average income of the men to whom that mail is delivered and who work equally hard the year round.

I submit to the House that $120 is a sufficient increase for this committee to recommend and for the House to make at one time, with a deficit staring the Post-Office Department in the face greater than has appeared within the last ten or twelve years, or since my service in this body and on this committee.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CROMER] insists that the carriers should be authorized to solicit subscriptions for newspapers and further takes the astounding position that these carriers should be given the privilege of refusing to solicit subscriptions for particular newspapers which happen to be obnoxious to them. He says that the recommendation of the committee against carriers soliciting business for any person, firm, or corporation takes away from the carrier his "right" to determine for whom he shall solicit business or for what newspaper he shall solicit subscriptions and for whom he will not solicit trade and what newspapers he will boycott.

The gentleman speaks truly. It does deny the carrier such privilege. Does the gentleman believe that a rural carrier should be left free to take away the rights of the newspapers and of the merchants in the town from which he travels? Would he make the carrier the practical dictator of the newspapers that the people of the country shall read and of the merchants in the small towns with whom the people of the country shall trade? Would he have officers of the Government, traveling on Government business, turned into drummers for one merchant to the exclusion of others?

I for one, Mr. Chairman, stand for no official of this Government; I stand for no organization of employees of this Government; I stand for the people who pay these carriers and who have the right to say from whom they shall order their goods and what newspapers they shall subscribe for. They have the right to have such papers as they wish delivered to them by the carriers, just as they desire them delivered, and to buy goods from whatever concerns with which they wish to trade unhampered by the drumming proclivities of rural carriers.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If the gentleman from Georgia will permit an interruption, there is nothing in the report of the committee that prevents carriers from carrying newspapers at all. They come in the mails like letters. The only thing is to prevent them from becoming the paid agents of particular newspapers.

Mr. GRIGGS. Certainly not. I have already stated everything the bill proposes on that particular question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, does not the gentleman from Georgia think, if they should be permitted the privilege of being the agents of any newspapers at all, that they should be compelled by law to be the agents of all newspapers, and at the same commission, if they were allowed to be subscribing agents at all?

Mr. GRIGGS. Certainly. If they are permitted to represent newspapers or to represent firms or corporations engaged in other lines of business, the law should require these carriers to accept orders from everybody equally and impartially—orders to everybody from everybody. But I do not believe Government agents should be private soliciting agents for anybody.

This bill does not prohibit carriers from delivering the papers, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CROMER] appears to understand. It simply proposes to require of carriers that they shall not solicit business or receive orders of any kind for any person, firm, or corporation, and shall not during their hours of employment carry any merchandise for hire, with a proviso; and I want to call the attention of the House to this proviso particularly, because this question seems to trouble some gentlemen very much indeed:

Provided, That said carriers may carry merchandise for hire for and upon the request of patrons residing upon their respective routes whenever the same shall not interfere with the proper discharge of their duties, and under such regulations as the Postmaster-General may prescribe.

If you are standing for the rights of the carrier, is not that sufficient privilege? It goes further and accommodates the patrons of the route, the very people for whom the route is established.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman allow me?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to his colleague?

Mr. GRIGGS. Why, certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. That simply means that the citizen along the line can have the carrier comply with his order, but that the carrier can not become the agent of the merchants or the newspapers.

Mr. GRIGGS. That is exactly it. The farmer residing along the route, the man for whose convenience rural free delivery was established, may have the benefit of sending orders by the carrier for such articles of merchandise as he may desire him to bring, and the carrier shall have the right to carry such articles and to receive pay for carrying them. That is all there is in that.

Mr. Chairman, in the second session of the Fifty-sixth Congress I made a speech against the organization of Government employees to promote legislation, and a great many gentlemen professed great astonishment at my temerity in making many statements contained therein, although the vast majority of the Members of this House who spoke to me upon the question privately, and a great many of them did so, agreed with me fully in what I then said. I think it is proper to read a paragraph or two from it in connection with my remarks to-day:

But what of the Government official, Mr. Chairman? Against whom does he organize? Is he organized against capital? He is organized against supposed oppression or wrong somewhere. He is necessarily organized against the Government of the United States. The Government is merely the agent of the people. He is not only himself one of the agents of the people, but he is one of the people. Whenever such organized effort is made by Government employees to bring pressure on Congress for the purpose of changing their relations to the Government, they are engaged in an effort to coerce not only Congress, but the people of the United States. That which would be denounced as treason and conspiracy on the part of soldiers is commended as a patriotic effort to redress wrongs on the part of civil employees.

I said further:

We are seeking to extend the benefits of rural mail delivery over the United States. The extension of this service has been to me a labor of love since I have had the honor to sit in this House. It is due to some of my friends in the House and to the creator of the latest Republican platform that I should disclaim any pretension to the fatherhood of this service. I am content with playing the benevolent stepfather. But, Mr. Chairman, when I look forward to the time when in every county in every Congressional district of this country there will be from 10 to 100 mail carriers organized into a vast body 150,000 strong, ostensibly for the purpose of increasing the efficiency of the service, but really working day and night to increase the salaries of themselves and to fight the Representative who will not bow to their behests, I see danger to American institutions.

I said further:

Let me give you a practical picture. Consider the fact as stated by me before in these remarks—and I defy contradiction—that every one of these employees bettered his financial condition when he entered the Government service and that every one would resign to-day and become a private citizen if by so doing he could better his present condition. If this be true, instead of commiserating with this "poor unfortunate class," we ought to congratulate them upon their great good fortune in having had the opportunity of entering the service of the Government. "Grown gray" in the service, have they? I see men all around me who have grown gray in the public service and who have fought for their lives every second year since entering political life. For their defeat and retirement to private life not a tear will fall from friend or foe. I see men around me in this House who in a few days will retire to private life unwept and unsung, but not, I hope, unhonored. And when it comes time for me, as it must come in the life of every man in public life, to drink of the bitter cup of defeat I must not only drink it amid the jeers and cheers of my opponents, but must take it with apparent relish.

Grown gray feeding at the public crib, the Government officials who are appointed to office must be protected from the people, who support them, their salaries fixed to suit them on demand, and at last pensioned by Congress. Ah, Mr. Chairman, rather than commiserate with the dancers, let us commiserate with the people who must pay the fiddlers. If a kind Providence and a beneficent Government have permitted them to "grow gray in the Government service," with salaries far greater than are paid for the same services in private life, they should thank God for the opportunity to lay up something for the evening of life, and be ready to stand aside with a competency for themselves, saved without compulsion, when, by reason of age, they have become incompetent.

[Applause.]

I said that about four years ago. It has come true to-day. I have never claimed to be a political prophet, but I may be pardoned for calling your attention to the fact that my prophecy made then that the rural carriers would soon organize for the purpose of controlling legislation in the House of Representatives has been verified. The letter inserted in the RECORD yesterday by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] is absolute proof of the fact that the carriers have organized for the purpose of intimidating Congress into acceding to their demands.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. They did intimidate Mr. Loud, and defeated him for reelection.

Mr. GRIGGS. They defeated but did not intimidate him.

Mr. BURLESON. I desire to read to the gentleman from Georgia an Executive order which was issued on the 31st of January, 1902:

Executive order.

All officers and employees of the United States, of every description, serving in or under any of the Executive Departments, and whether so serving in or out of Washington, are hereby forbidden, either directly or indirectly, individually or through associations, to solicit an increase of pay or to influence or attempt to influence in their own interest any other legislation whatever, either before Congress or its committees, or in any way save through the heads of the Departments in or under which they serve, on penalty of dismissal from the Government service.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, January 31, 1902.

I should like to ask the gentleman from Georgia what has become of this Executive order? Is it still in force? If so, how is it that the gentleman at the head of the Post-Office Department has assured the president of the Rural Letter Carriers National Association that no harm shall come to him because of efforts and influence that he may direct against Congressmen to obtain an increase in pay? Is this Executive order a jest?

Mr. GRIGGS. I have always so understood [laughter]; and I will say, further, to my friend that if I was representing the present occupant of the White House as his attorney in this particular case I would enter a plea of guilty right now and stop further trouble. [Applause and laughter.]

This letter, inserted in the RECORD by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] the other day, and which I shall print, explains fully and answers fully the question of my friend from Texas [Mr. BURLESON].

Perhaps I had better read that letter to the House:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 7, 1904.

To the rural letter carriers of the United States:

I believe we have got things coming our way and will succeed if you do your part. I understand the situation, and the Department will take no notice of any work you do in regard to pushing our bill.

The general appropriation bill under which our relief will come will be brought before the House for consideration to-day. It will likely be under consideration all this week, and the vote may not be taken before the first of next week, but do not delay your telegrams. Send them as soon as possible after receiving this communication.

The carriers from each county should send a telegram something like the following:

"Hon. ——— ———, M. C., Washington, D. C.:

"Rural carriers of ———County unanimously favor graded scale, fifteen days' vacation. Let privileges alone; earnestly support amendment.

"Yours, respectfully."

Then let every carrier get at least one influential patron or politician and, if possible, some one who is personally acquainted with your Member of Congress to sign a telegram something like the following:

"Hon. ——— ———, M. C., Washington, D. C.:

"Rural patrons unanimously favor graded scale, fifteen days' vacation. Let privileges alone; earnestly support amendment. Vitally interested.

"Yours, respectfully."

These telegrams will not cost more than 40 or 50 cents, so as quick as you can get them signed fire them in. There will be thousands of telegrams, and it means over $20 a month increase in our salary. So see to it that your link in the chain does not fail, and if any carrier can send three or four of these kind of telegrams it will greatly assist us.

I have now got the assistance of quite a number of prominent men from different parts of the country who have millions behind them. They are interested and are here personally to help with the fight. We are thoroughly organized, and they are bringing powerful influence to bear upon the Members of Congress.

Where you were once in despair you now have hope. We must have these telegrams. Do your duty, and do it quick.

State officers, do not lose one moment in forwarding these communications to your county associates and carriers throughout your State.

County officers, do not lose one moment in getting these instructions to every carrier in your county, and have him do his duty.

Yours, very respectfully,

F. H. CUNNINGHAM,
National President.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know under what sort of orders these carriers have their president in Washington demanding legislation from Congress. I do not know who has given them permission to send their representative here to lobby for increased pay. I do know now why it has happened that within the last few days, since this bill came up for consideration, Members of this House have been flooded with telegrams from their districts, all in exactly the same language, showing conclusively that they were sent out first from one common center. The letter from Cunningham explains that. I do know that these things have happened and that they are happening, and I may be excused for saying further, Mr. Chairman, that my opinion is that a body of gentlemen who are able to maintain a lobby in the city of Washington to look after their interests are certainly getting along pretty well and that the increase of $120 a year—20 per cent—in their salary is the greatest liberality on the part of this House.

Now, gentlemen say they do not understand why it is that the Post-Office Department recommended that the express-package business on the part of carriers be stopped. I will tell you what the Department said to us about it. They said that in a great many districts throughout the country the people have been complaining that the delivery of the mails was delayed on account of it; that carriers go out loaded [laughter]—I mean that they go out with their vehicles loaded to the gunwales with packages of all descriptions, shapes, and sizes—and that the carrying of the mail has come to be a secondary object with them.

That is what came to this committee from the Post-Office Department as the reason for this recommendation. I do not mind saying that this particular provision is the result, as almost all legislation is, of a compromise among all the members of our committee. We all had our ideas about it; we were all, like most politicians, ready to express our ideas within the sacred and secret precincts of the committee room, and we expressed them; but when we finally reached a conclusion—when we finally reached that mental harmony that is necessary among seventeen Members to recommend any sort of legislation, this paragraph was the "baby." This is what we present to the House as, in the opinion of the members of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, the very best legislation that can be made on this subject.

Now, I was going to add—but my friend from Texas and myself, I believe, covered that ground in his question to me and in my answer to him; but I will add here that as I understand it no other association of Government employees is permitted to lobby with the Members of Congress. That was stopped several years ago, whether as the result of complaints made by Members of Congress to the Executive I can not say; but I may be pardoned for saying that it was after the delivery of the speech from which I have just quoted that lobbying on the part of organizations of Government employees throughout the United States was stopped by this Executive order, and that so far as I know there is no other organization now plying Members of this House with requests for legislation in their behalf. If in my humble capacity I have succeeded in turning the faces of Republican officials toward the sunlight I am glad. I do not understand why this organization of rural carriers should be permitted privileges not permitted to others, unless it be that every day except Sunday all through the year they travel up and down every public road in the United States and have opportunities of conversing with the people all over the country that other employees do not have.

If that is the reason for it, it is not a good one; if there is any other, I will thank some gentleman to get upon the floor of this House and give it now.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. GRIGGS. Certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman stated that the Rural Delivery Carriers' Association was the only organization that is "permitted" to lobby Congress for legislation.

Mr. GRIGGS. So far as I know.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman used the word "permitted." Will the gentleman please explain the evidence that he has that the Administration had any knowledge of the practice of this association before yesterday and that the Administration is permitting it—the Postmaster-General or any other official with authority has given any permission to this organization to violate the civil-service order just read a minute ago by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON]?

Mr. GRIGGS. You mean before the information you gave in that letter?

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman permit me to answer the gentleman from Indiana out of the letter that he put in the RECORD?

Mr. GRIGGS. I shall be glad to. I will allow my friend to answer.

Mr. BURLESON. I will read it from the letter the gentleman caused to be printed in the RECORD. This letter commences:

I believe we have got things coming our way and will succeed if you do your part. I understand the situation, and the Department will take no notice of any work you do in regard to pushing our bill.

It meant "the understanding" had with the Department by F. H. Cunningham, the national president; what the gentleman from Indiana is now inquiring about.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Why does the gentleman say——

Mr. GRIGGS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like for my friends to fight their duels in their own time. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I beg your pardon.

Mr. GRIGGS. If the gentleman from Indiana will address his remarks to me I will listen. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I desire to state to the gentleman from Texas——

Mr. GRIGGS. I do not mean any disrespect to my friend from Texas, but the gentleman from Indiana must address himself to me.

Mr. CRUMPACKER (continuing). It seemed to me it was hardly justifiable to make the statement that the Administration was "permitting" a violation of this peremptory order upon the information contained in that letter. I do not think it a sufficient basis to support that charge.

Mr. GRIGGS. In reply to the distinguished gentleman from Indiana I make that statement, or make use of the word "permitted," on the testimony brought before the House by my friend Judge CRUMPACKER, from Indiana, in whom I have every confidence on every question except one, and he knows what that is. [Laughter and applause.] It is upon the authority of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] himself. I say the Department has permitted this organization to lobby with Congress and has refused the same privilege to all other organizations of Government employees.

As my friend Judge ADAMSON suggests, it is entirely wrong in itself, but it is doubly wrong when the Post-Office Department investigates Congress whenever Members attempt to lobby with the Post-Office Department for their constituents. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURLESON. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia to the fact——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. GRIGGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURLESON (continuing). That in this letter it is stated that Cunningham has an understanding that the Department will take no action against them for the work that they do in that matter.

Mr. GRIGGS. I presumed that all the Members of the House had read the remarks of my friend from Indiana this morning, and that all Members were probably acquainted with this letter, or that if they were not already acquainted with the facts therein contained that, like some of my friends I now see on the other side, they have all gotten the RECORD and perused this letter which seems to have excited so much attention in the House to-day and none when it was read yesterday upon the other side of the House. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. Chairman, the rural carriers in my district are all very clever gentlemen. I know most of them, and before they were covered into the civil service I named a majority of the carriers in my district. I know most of them well, and I gladly testify that in the main they are clever gentlemen and faithful officials. A number of them have written me, saying, "Exercise your own judgment about this matter, and do what is best for us and for the people."

With very few exceptions they have made no organized demands on me, and if they were to do so I would simply refer them to the speech I made in this House three years ago on this question of the organization of Government employees to promote legislation, and from which I have just quoted. We propose to give them, as the House will understand, a salary of $720 a year, an increase of 20 per cent. Now, what is their complaint? Their chief complaint seems to be that their city brethren get more than they do. That is one complaint they make, that they are entitled to the same pay that their city brethren in the carriers' association are entitled to. That may be true. I will not deny that proposition here to-day, but I will say, gentlemen, that an increase of $120 on $600 in one year is sufficient for any organization to demand and for any man to receive. I recognize the expense necessary for their equipment, but I may be permitted to suggest that a return of $720 per annum on an investment of $400 is a very fair return indeed. Now, I want to say a word on a paragraph in this bill which we refer to down in the committee when we discuss it as the "per diem paragraph." Some members of the committee call it "per de-em" and some of us "per diem," and when we get sometimes real cordially polite we "per diem" fellows change our pronunciation to "per de-em" and our "per de-em" friends change to "per diem;" nevertheless it is a question that has troubled our committee and is worrying some of the members of it to-day.

You will note, gentlemen, in the paragraph on rural agents, for seventy-five rural agents in the field, when actually traveling on business of the Post-Office Department, at a rate not to exceed $3 per day; for seventy-four rural agents when actually traveling on business of the Department, etc., $4 per day. Now, then, this $4 per day which is paid to seventy-four rural agents is paid exclusively to the higher-salaried men in the service. The men who get the highest salary are paid $4 per diem. The men who get the lowest salaries are paid $3 per diem. Is that right? The service is exactly the same. Gentlemen may talk all they please about the work of certain rural agents requiring them to spend $4 per day, while others doing the same work are required to spend $3 per diem. Why, there is hardly a man in the service who has not been in there from three to four years, and they have all had plenty of experience and they all perform exactly the same labor.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Vermont?

Mr. GRIGGS. With pleasure.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. This per diem is intended to pay the necessary traveling expenses?

Mr. GRIGGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. The hotel expenses, etc. Does the Post-Office Committee, which reported this provision, claim that it costs more to feed these higher-priced men——

Mr. GRIGGS. I do not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Does the Post-Office Committee, which reported this provision, claim that it costs more to feed a certain class of these route agents than another class?

Mr. GRIGGS. The member of the committee now speaking does not.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Then I would like to know on just what grounds this committee bases it?

Mr. GRIGGS. The only ground on which the committee inserted this provision is that Mr. Bristow said in his testimony before the committee that it was not all used for actual traveling expenses, but that it was calculated on a basis of about 300 days' work in a year, and it was for compensation rather than for expenses.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. But this is all given in addition to the regular salary?

Mr. GRIGGS. In addition to the regular salary. If this House determines that $4 a day is the amount necessary for the actual necessary traveling expenses of these people, then all of these people ought to have that per diem. But if the House determines that $3 a day is sufficient, then $3 per day ought to be granted as a per diem for all of them. They all ought to be in one class so far as per diem is concerned. One grade is not entitled to eat more than the other; one grade is not entitled to sleep in a better bed or a higher-priced room than the other; one grade is not to be sent to the Waldorf and the other to a soup house. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. GRIGGS. With pleasure.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. As I understand, the officials when traveling on the railroad pay no fare. That is a part of the contract of the railroads with the Government, that these men shall travel without paying fare. This question of actual expenses is merely a question of paying the hotel bills.

Mr. GRIGGS. If my friend from Vermont will permit me—he and I seem to agree—the rural agents are paid salaries running from $1,000 up to, I think, sixteen hundred dollars a year. Now, they all perform exactly the same service. They ride under contract between the Government and the railroads on transportation furnished by the railroad free. It doesn't cost the agent anything. They make a return of their bills to the Post-Office Department for livery hire, and that is paid by the Government. The only expense they have is for their actual necessary living. I do not think the question was asked in the hearings, but I believe the Department also construes it to mean Pullman-car fare if they have to travel at night. I think the Government pays that also.

Now, I say there is no reason, there is no justice, in this provision making this difference between these two classes. I think myself $3 a day is enough. I am sure it is sufficient in the South to pay the traveling expenses of these rural agents, and I am sure that gentlemen in the West and the great Northwest think it is sufficient there. I have not discussed it with any friends from the East, but I believe it would apply with equal force to the East.

Mr. JOHNSON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. GRIGGS. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it not a fact that whenever an agent goes out into the country to lay out a rural route there are always a great many people who are ready, willing, and anxious to haul him through the country? In my district they do not have any buggy or horse hire to pay. The inhabitants are ready and anxious to carry them free.

Mr. GRIGGS. I presume that is a fact. I am not charging that the agents ever return any bills for livery hire that are not correct. What I mean to say is that the Government pays for it whenever necessary, and that it does not come out of their per diem.

Mr. ADAMSON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. GRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not wish to break in on the continuity of the gentleman's speech——

Mr. GRIGGS. Oh, the gentleman need not worry about that. It is a disjointed speech.

Mr. ADAMSON. Before the gentleman leaves the discussion of carriers I wish, as a matter of information, for him to explain the proposition of a graded scale of salaries for carriers. We have all received telegrams about it and I have heard gentlemen indorse it. Now, the gentleman has had a great deal of information before the committee, and I want to know whether the carriers want it graded now, to start it off, for fear Congress will not increase their salaries later.

Mr. GRIGGS. The graded scale, as I understand it, is that the carrier when first appointed to the service shall receive $600 a year, the next year $720, and the next year $850.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is, in lieu of allowing Congress to increase it two or three times, they want to relieve Congress of the necessity of acting three times and permit them to act once.

Mr. GRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Under that proposition of a graded scale, if a carrier receiving $850 should resign and be succeeded by a new one, would he have to go back and begin at the $600 rate?

Mr. GRIGGS. I understand that he would.

Mr. ADAMSON. Is there any other arm of the civil service in which that graded scale exists?

Mr. GRIGGS. If my friend from Georgia keeps on, I am afraid he will put me in the attitude of defending this proposition. [Laughter.] I will say in answer to the gentleman's question that there is—the city letter carriers.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then they want to extend the abuse to the country.

Mr. GRIGGS. They do, and I do not want them to do it.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Does the question you are discussing involve any new legislation this year?

Mr. GRIGGS. This is all practically new legislation. This entire paragraph is new legislation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am informed that one of the reasons why we have a large deficit, an increasing deficit, is because of things like this having been done: That instead of sending our cannon and heavy ordnance by freight from the East to San Francisco to be sent to the Philippines they are sent by the postal service registered, on postal cars, instead of being sent as freight on freight cars, as other freight is sent. Does the gentleman know anything about that?

Mr. GRIGGS. I do not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am told that such is the fact, and that that is one reason for the big deficit in our postal service.

Mr. GRIGGS. I have never heard of the matter suggested by my friend from Tennessee, but I am not on particularly intimate terms with the Department. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have asked my question, and my friend has answered it in his usual jolly way. I hope the facts are not as I have suggested, though here I have been told it is a fact that we have been sending our heavy ordnance, including cannon by the postal service instead of by freight. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRIGGS. I have heard somewhere that in some war it occurred to an officer that it would be a good idea to hitch a cannon on the back of a mule—one of these self-acting guns that shoot all day without reloading—and to drive the mule to the front and turn him loose on the enemy. It was never tried but once. To the great consternation and dismay of all the soldiers, I am informed, the mule turned wrong end foremost and by continuous gyrations cleaned up both armies. [Laughter.] I have heard that. I do not know whether that gun was sent there by mail or by mule, or whether it was mule mail or mail mule. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I asked the gentleman the question because I knew he was an expert on mail service. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. The gentleman will allow me to ask whether it has not been the experience of the Democratic party that the mule is not to be trusted on all occasions. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRIGGS. That is true, especially when the mule gets mixed up with Republicans. [Laughter.] What does my friend from Indiana think of the bronco?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. The bronco always carries his burden and lands it at the right point.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word about the famous Bristow report. Owing to my illness and subsequent absence from the city on public business at the time of the consideration of the Hay resolution I was not present with the committee when it took final action. However, I was present during many meetings of the subcommittee of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads when these matters were discussed informally, and so far as I am concerned I can see no reason for criticism of the committee's action. In fact, I can not understand how the Post-Office Committee could have done otherwise than they did. Here was a resolution referred to that committee——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understand the gentleman to say he does not see how the Post-Office Committee could have done otherwise than they did.

Mr. GRIGGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Was there anything that absolutely compelled the Post-Office Committee to print the data which they got from the Post-Office Department under the general heading of "Charges concerning Members of Congress?"

Mr. GRIGGS. Well, I can not indorse the publication under that general head.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then there is something else they might have done.

Mr. GRIGGS. That was not in the report that came under my observation.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That was the report which was filed here by the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. GRIGGS. I think that was unfortunate, but I will say——

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS] yield to me a moment?

Mr. GRIGGS. Certainly.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I made my explanation of that matter at the time it was up in the House; I am quite willing to repeat it.

Mr. GRIGGS. For whose benefit is my friend going to repeat it—for mine?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No; to explain the statement made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. GRIGGS. Very well.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The manuscript of the report was sent to the Public Printer, and in the very nature of things it was too voluminous to have the proof read by a member of the committee. We trusted to the reading of the proof by the proof reader at the Government Printing Office. The first copies of the report which were sent to this House did contain the language suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], and improperly so, I admit, and as soon as I saw the first copy containing that language I directed the committee clerk to notify the Government Printing Office that that was not a proper part of the report, that it was not justified by the original manuscript, and should not be printed on the report.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I yielded to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] to ask a question. I yielded to my friend from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] to explain. The gentleman from Wisconsin will have plenty of time to talk later. I will see that he gets some time from this committee, if he wishes it, after I conclude.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I wish to ask one question.

Mr. GRIGGS. Go ahead. I am about as liberal with time as a man can be, I think, if I do say it myself.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, the question I desire to ask is this: I never have known the Government Printing Office to print anything that was not on the manuscript. Who wrote on the manuscript the words "Charges concerning Members of Congress?"

Mr. BARTLETT. We will find out in a few days, I think.

Mr. GRIGGS. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that it was written in the Post-Office Department. I understood so from my friend from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] just a moment ago.

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not mean to convey that impression, if my colleague will permit me. I think the House will find out in a few days who is responsible for it, and will find out fully.

Mr. GRIGGS. It is a matter of absolute indifference to me who is responsible for it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should like to ask the gentleman to let me interrupt him just a moment.

Mr. GRIGGS. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to suggest to the gentleman, and indirectly to other members of the committee, whether it would not be wise to wait until we do know a little more about some of these things before we entirely commit ourselves on this question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Why did you not obey your own precept?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did; and if gentlemen will turn to my speech they will find that no man's name was mentioned in any remark I made.

Mr. GRIGGS. If you had listened to mine, you would have understood that no man has been named in my remarks.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have listened.

Mr. GRIGGS. And that I have not committed myself on this question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have listened with great interest, and that is the reason why I thought I might join the gentleman.

Mr. GRIGGS. I thank my friend from Ohio for indorsing what I have said [laughter] and joining with me, because it is not often he indorses what a good Democrat says. [Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not exactly indorse what you have said, but I indorse the manner in which you have said it. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRIGGS. I thank you very much for that. When certificates of character seem to be necessary around the House, I am glad to add as many as I can to my bouquet. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understood the gentleman from Georgia to say that he had not mentioned any names. He has distinctly twice called this the Bristow report.

Mr. GRIGGS. Oh, well, that is the name of it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No, it is not.

Mr. GRIGGS. It came to us over his name, the first Bristow report.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No, it is not the Bristow report at all—the last report, the one the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. He is talking about the first one.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I say right here and now I have no quarrel with Mr. Bristow or with any other official in the Post-Office Department, and if I called this "the Bristow report"—and I presume I did—I called it so because that is the name by which it is generally known. I merely identified it.

Let me read, however, the name of this volume:

> Letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting so much of the report of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General on the investigation of the said Department as may be made public without harm to the public interest.

Mr. Bristow is the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General.

That is the heading printed on the cover of the first Bristow report.

Mr. BARTLETT. Document No. 383.

Mr. GRIGGS. I do not know what the number of the document is. The second report came to the committee through the examination of Mr. Bristow by members of the committee. He was asked if he could not furnish to the committee what was omitted in that first report of his. It came about in that way. Afterwards a letter was sent from the chairman of the committee to make it formal, but it was first begun under the questioning of members of subcommittee No. 1 of the Post-Office Committee, which had in charge the consideration of this appropriation bill. The second edition of that report was not obtained for the purpose of investigating Members of Congress. It was not during the consideration of the Hay resolution. The facts set forth there were obtained for the purpose of giving to that subcommittee full and complete information on all subjects connected with the Post-Office Department in order that it might aid us in making up this bill now before the House. That is how it came; and if I called it "the Bristow report" I spoke correctly. I do not think my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] ought to complain after this statement of the facts, which will be substantiated and corroborated by every one of the six other members of that subcommittee. I am not attacking Mr. Bristow. I am merely stating facts as I see them.

Now, we got these facts before the Post-Office Committee. We did not know whether anybody else except ourselves knew they were there or not. That was a question that we were unable to fathom; but, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, leaks began somewhere, I do not know where; but it began to leak out that the Post-Office Committee was in possession of information that would condemn Members of this House. You all saw statements in various newspapers to this effect. If there were to be leaks in the barrel, I for one said, and I repeat it to-day, that it was the duty of that committee to pull out the bung, to let all the facts go at once, and let the country see them all together at one time. [Applause.] Leaks might ruin the reputation of any Member of this House, according to the character of the man to whom it leaked or from whom it leaked and whether he liked or disliked that Member of the House; and instead of letting it leak out to the public the Post-Office Committee determined, and I say determined wisely and in the interest of every man whose name is in this report and in the interest of right and of justice, to let all the facts come out into the sunlight at once. That is all there is in that.

I want to say another thing right here, and several gentlemen sitting before me will remember this, too. I insisted last December that every line and every syllable of the Bristow report should be published. Now, listen to the title of this volume:

So much of the report of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General on the investigation of the said Department as may be made public without harm to the public interest.

Now, that was confessedly an edited report, and while I shall not violate any committee secrets, I have the right to say for myself that I insisted then on behalf of the committee itself that every word and every line and every jot and every tittle of that report should be given to the public then. In discussing that question with my friends on the other side of this Chamber, both inside and outside the committee, I said that it was due to the committee itself that if it were proposed to publish a report under its sanction, it should be edited, if edited at all, by the committee by whose authority it was to be published; but I insisted then that the whole report ought to be printed, and I believe that to-day.

Gentlemen say that this is as much as may be made public "without harm to the public interest." When I inquire what that means, they say that men are under indictment and that the publication of that entire report might interfere with the wheels of justice. If the publication of the entire Bristow report would acquit every man under indictment he is entitled to have it printed, and the people of the United States are too great, too strong, too powerful, and too generous to convict any man, high or low, by the suppression of any facts. [Applause.] For one I do not believe that inspectors are sent out to convict. They are sent after facts. [Applause.]

I said then, and I say now, that if the publication of these things would convict men not under indictment, be the man of high or low degree, it ought to be printed, and let it stand for whatever it is worth before the whole people of this country. [Loud applause.] I said to my Republican friends, "This report will return to plague you;" and the great hysteria I observed in the House of Representatives when I entered this Hall last Thursday is ample proof of the correctness of my position on that occasion. It stands as self-evident now that not only what we did print at first should have been printed, but that all should have been made public. It is as true to-day as it was then. The Post-Office Department opposes publishing the reports of inspectors. They say that reports of these officials ought not to be given to the public gaze, for what reason I know not. They seem to fear daylight for some reason. If there are men in the inspectors' service who are afraid for their reports to bask in the sunlight, then, gentlemen, such men ought to be got rid of and men put there who are not afraid. [Applause.] There are too many confidential matters in the Post-Office Department. A great public institution full of confidential affairs is an anomaly.

It is not within my knowledge how gentlemen were moved to publish a part of this report at the time. There is some of it not concerning Members of this House, so far as I know, but there are yet other things in the Bristow report on this business that ought to be made public.

Mr. BARTLETT. Permit me to say that there is Exhibit Q, referred to in that report, that was used to base the charges as they claim against Members in that report, and yet that has not yet been published.

Mr. GRIGGS. That is what I was trying to say. [Laughter.] I am glad to have the corroboration of my colleague, because he is a man usually accurate with facts, and not afraid to express his opinion on those facts when he gets possession of them.

Now, then, the minority of the Committee on Post-Offices has made a report on this bill. At least it ought to be called a report, but I am informed that under the rules of the House, about which I know little and care less [laughter]—because of my observations of the workings of these rules ever since I have been here—that under the rules of the House the minority is not allowed to make a report.

The minority is only permitted to file "views." I always did despise a man with "views." I like a man with opinions; but a man with "views" is always and eternally in the way and is of no service to anybody or anything. And yet the minority is forced, under these rules, if it wishes to do anything at all to show disagreement with the majority, to submit "views." Well, we have submitted some "views" to the House, and while we know you can not vote on them—that you will not be permitted by the bosses to vote upon them—these views are here and for the country to read. I commend them to your prayerful consideration.

Did you ever think what a ridiculous aspect this House made of itself the other day? You Republicans were as mad as hornets. I was not here at the beginning of the row, but from what I could see in the papers and from what I saw after I did get here, you were as mad as any hornet ever was. Somewhere in the great Book of Books it is said, "Let not the sun go down on your wrath;" but the leaders on your side of the House were wise enough to let the sun go down on your wrath, and it did go down on your wrath, and the next day you literally overturned the injunction of Paul, "Be ye steadfast in the faith." [General laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed an hour.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I have as much time as I may desire to consume.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair simply states that an hour has been consumed. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized to conclude his remarks.

Mr. GRIGGS. This is the first time I have ever had the honor to begin a speech to empty chairs and draw a full house before concluding. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, did you gentlemen ever think of the ridiculous position this House placed itself in a few days ago? The minority of the committee started out on this principle: That if the Post-Office Department could afford to be investigated, you of the majority could not afford to refuse a general investigation; that if it could not afford an investigation, you could and would probably refuse to give it. You did refuse to investigate.

We set out here to investigate the Post-Office Department, and our Republican friends turned out like hornets when their nest is disturbed, and you insisted that the whole thing from top to bottom must be investigated. It was all in the air here when I came back, among Republicans as well as Democrats. You said, "We will tear the roof off the whole thing and go from the dome to the cellar." I thought then that we were going right through the Department, but it wasn't long before many of the most vociferous among the advance guard were down in the cellar anxiously inquiring, "Has the cyclone passed yet?" My friend from Massachusetts said, "Let us wash our own linen first" [laughter], and you boys answered, "All right," and you turned tail and went to washing your own linen with all possible vigor and haste, and, so far as I can see, you are going to leave the Post-Office Department absolutely free from investigation by Congress. You started to investigate the post-office and wound up with the Post-Office Department investigating you. [Laughter and applause.] You are going to spend the summer investigating and washing yourselves.

That was a great coup on the part of the Department; that was a stroke of state——

Mr. CLAYTON. A sort of loop the loop.

Mr. GRIGGS. Worthy of——

Mr. HAMLIN. Talleyrand.

Mr. GRIGGS. My friend says Talleyrand. I presume that is all right; I suppose he knows whom he is talking about. A gentleman told me a story yesterday, and I believe I will tell it to you in strict confidence. Now, understand, I am not making any comparisons or applications. I am telling you this simply for your entertainment. This gentleman said to me to-day that he once had the best trained lot of setter dogs he ever saw. There were three or four of them, and one day the dogs all came rushing in the house pellmell, helter-skelter, fighting over a bone, each one determined to take it for himself. In the rowthey ran under the bed, and one of the boys tried to get them out.

They paid absolutely no attention to his repeated calls, but growled and barked and snapped as if to say each for himself, "I am not coming; I am going to 'chaw' this bone or another dog right now." [Applause.] Pretty soon the right man—the master—came. He ordered them out. Immediately the dogs recognized the voice of command. Dropping the bone, they walked out perfectly subdued and quiet, and looking as if they were really ashamed of the racket they had been making. One day you were going through the Post-Office Department like a cyclone. The next day you defeated our resolution to investigate the Department and adopted a miserable resolution investigating yourselves. [Great applause on Democratic side.] Now, gentlemen, I want to congratulate the leaders on that side of the House on having the finest organization in the world. There is no great war captain from Julius Cæsar to Theodore Roosevelt [laughter]—no conquering hero ever marched before a better drilled host than does the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the leader on your side. [Applause.] And I may say a few complimentary words about the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]. He is a first-class lieutenant, and, gentlemen, I do not care what anybody may say, these——

A MEMBER. Do not forget General GROSVENOR.

Mr. GRIGGS. Oh, everybody knows that the gentleman from Ohio is one of the great leaders, and that he has a hand in doing everything that is done in this House that is right. Of course he is one of the leaders.

Mr. CLAYTON. He is a major.

Mr. GRIGGS. Yes, these gentlemen may congratulate themselves upon the leadership of this House. They have it in their hands. I am proud of them as fellow-citizens, although I do not like their political affiliations. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word, not in condemnation of the Post-Office Department, but in criticism of abuses that have grown up there during many years, and probably under both political parties. While the Post-Office Department may not be corrupt, or, rather, may not be more corrupt than is shown by the Bristow report, I do not know whether it is or not, I shall not make charges which I can not substantiate, and I could not sustain a charge like that without an investigation, but I do say that the system is entirely wrong. I repeat that it is a bad system that makes it necessary for a Member of Congress to go to any Department of the Government in order to obtain that to which his constituents are justly entitled.

Now, take a great Department like the Post-Office Department, with its rules relating to allowances made to post-offices kept absolutely secret. I mean the basis on which allowances are calculated and granted. I do not know, you do not know, no postmaster knows what allowances his office is entitled to, and if many are obtained the Member of Congress must go and ask for them and he must make his request in the dark; yet he is charged by somebody with having been guilty of at least improprieties for going and requesting that which his constituents even did not know they were entitled to, and which he himself can not ascertain except by preferring his request for an allowance which he can not know is proper or improper. Now, that is the system. Gentlemen, here is a great Department of the Government run like a little cotton farm in the South. We have a system of croppers down there. The farmer furnishes the land and the stock, and the cropper furnishes the labor.

The expenses of operating the farm are paid out of the proceeds of the crop, and the remainder, if any, is equally divided between the landlord and the cropper. The farmer must supply his cropper during the year, because, as everybody knows, the majority of the people who work the cotton farms in the South are negroes, careless and improvident, and spend all they can lay their hands on during the year. The landlord must spend his time the entire year pulling back against the demands of his croppers in order that they may not owe him more than their share of the crop will sell for in the fall.

Now, that is the method of cotton farming in much of the South. It has to be done that way, for if the landlord acceded to all the demands of his croppers in any one year it would require the interposition of Providence to save him from bankruptcy.

The great Post-Office Department has rules and regulations which are kept secret from Members of Congress, which are kept secret from the postmasters and the other employees of the Department, who may be entitled to allowances for different things, and the Members of Congress must work, year in and year out, in the dark as to what allowances their post-offices and postmasters may be entitled for the betterment of the postal facilities of their constituents.

The system is wrong, gentlemen. Is there a remedy?

I have thought sometimes during all this excitement that it would probably be well for Congress to set apart one day in every month for Members to look after matters in the Post-Office Department. Monday would be the best day. We might then request special prayers for the Department and Members in all the churches the Sunday preceding. Then, after fasting through Sunday, the Member might be required to get up early Monday and before being allowed to eat his breakfast read through the criminal statutes, repeat the Ten Commandments both forward and backward at least thirty times, the number of days in a month, then hanging about his neck a placard as large as may be, according to his avoirdupois, containing the Eighth Commandment in red letters, as a shining testimonial to his honesty. Thus armed and equipped I believe he would be comparativaly safe, at least. If this House wants to get rid of me the adoption of this rule would carry balm to a few aching hearts far away. [Laughter and applause.]

Seriously, I do not know the best remedy for it without further thought, but an editorial in the Washington Post challenged my attention yesterday. The Post is a great newspaper. It is usually fair and always ably edited. The editorial I refer to is entitled "Publicity the only cure." I believe it would be a good thing to do. Let every Department, as suggested here, publish every day a bulletin of what has been done in that Department, and at whose request. It would be worth far more than the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, talking into which wastes much valuable time here. I believe that this would help the system, as bad as it is. I am glad that the suggestion was made. I hope at some time in the near future Congress in its wisdom will see fit to at least test this idea.

Why not, in addition to this, require the Department to make its rules as to allowances public? If they will do that, then no Member will be in danger of being misconstrued at any time; he will know what he is doing and the public will also know what he is doing.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If the gentleman will pardon me, there will be no danger of any postmaster being swindled by the Government when he is entitled under secret regulation to an advance in pay which is not given to him except upon the personal solicitation of a Member of Congress. If he is entitled to it, and it is retained, he is being swindled by a great Government.

Mr. GRIGGS. There is no question in my mind of that, and I am glad my friend from Mississippi has made it so much clearer than I could possibly have made it. If these post-offices are entitled to these allowances, they ought to know it and ought to have them. If they are not entitled to them, we ought to know it and they ought to know it, and there would be no request for it. I stand for the very best possible mail facilities all over this country, and I intend to see to it, as far as I am able, that my district is not neglected. [Great applause.]

I thank you, gentlemen, for your attention.

[Editorial from Washington Post, March 14, 1904.]

PUBLICITY THE ONLY CURE.

Excitement in Congress over the presentation and consideration of the now famous "Bristow" report on the relations of Congressmen with the Post-Office Department has not yet subsided. The indignation of many Members whose requests for increased allowances for their constituents, made in good faith and from honest motives, have been pronounced "irregular" and "improper" is but natural and justifiable. The unfortunate feature of the case is that they should be compelled to have their names coupled with those of ex-postal officials now under sentence or indictment for Department rascalities. The situation forces the Congressmen involved to enter upon a campaign of explanation, and explanations, be it remembered, are not likely to prove popular with the voters.

The outburst of feeling in Congress will not be in vain if it results in devising a system for the management of departmental affairs that will remove the excuse for conditions warranting a recurrence of such exposures. How can such scandals be avoided in the future? Obviously the greatest safeguard is publicity as now employed and more liberally proposed in the case of trusts. The method of securing this publicity is important, and the Post begs to offer a suggestion. Why should not the Government publish a daily official gazette, under whatever title may be decided upon, giving all appointments, promotions, removals, increases in salaries, increased allowances, award of contracts, and all actions of the Government affecting or involving the expenditure of public money? Such a publication would furnish the means, which the newspapers of the nation would promptly and eagerly welcome, of printing in every Congressional district in the country from day to day every official action of the Congressman affecting the officeholders in his district, and thus subject this action to the test of scrutiny and local criticism.

There would be an end to the scandals over the leasing of public buildings, the increase of allowances for postmasters, and the award of contracts. Bidders would receive notification of pending contracts and favoritism would be made impossible. Publicity invites confidence; secrecy breeds suspicion. Almost every Member of the Congress who has spoken in response to implications made against him in the "Bristow" report has asserted—and the Post believes truthfully—that he has nothing to conceal in the matters under discussion and has done nothing in such connection in a surreptitious manner. Such being the case, the Congressman should welcome the proposed publicity of all departmental affairs affecting matters in his district.

While Department changes are made by the thousand during the year, the daily list could be easily printed in much less space than is now occupied in the production of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The expense of the publication can not be considered, in view of the saving in public money that would undoubtedly be accomplished by the proposed publicity. To make such a publication effective there should be an explicit and positive requirement, either by legislation or Executive order, that Department heads should furnish full and complete information daily upon the matters to be included in the gazette. The present situation is critical for many Members of the Congress, and we are convinced that they can not protect themselves more effectually than by a law compelling publicity in all such matters.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Before the gentleman takes his seat I would like to say that I have listened with a great deal of interest to his remarks and have derived much information from them. I want to ask him whether he had any information, or whether any intimation was made to the committee, that the Department in transmitting that report in regard to rentings had suppressed important documents containing the main facts on which the rentings were made?

Mr. GRIGGS. Not so far as I know. But I had very little information about it. I became ill on the day before that particular evidence came to the committee, and have been in the committee but one or two days since then. I was afterwards absent on public business until last Thursday.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I have stated in reference to one particular case, touching the rentings in Oxford, N. C., that all the important documents were omitted from the report. I wanted to know whether the committee had any information on that matter.

Mr. GRIGGS. The committee had no information on that line which has ever come to my notice.

Mr. MADDOX. Now, if the gentleman from Georgia will pardon me, I noticed in the report in a number of cases, after going through their method, whatever it is, that in a number of instances they say, for instance, a post-office is entitled to $160 and only $100 is allowed. I want to ask the gentleman if he can explain why it is that if they were entitled to $160 the Department should withhold the other $60?

Mr. GRIGGS. No, sir; I can not explain it. There are a number of cases like that. I am, like my colleague, unable to understand them, and from the great number of easily apparent errors on this line I am forced to the conclusion that the man who made the regulations is in as profound a state of ignorance as anyone. I thank the House again for the great compliment of its earnest attention during my talk. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CRUMPACKER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to bills of the following titles:

S. 3274. An act granting an increase of pension to Jane I. Long; and

S. 1543. An act granting an increase of pension to William W. Jackson.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 10669) to regulate the issue of licenses for Turkish, Russian, or medicated baths in the District of Columbia, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House to the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. HANSBROUGH, and Mr. MARTIN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 885) granting a pension to Sarah A. Gillham.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 55.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to return to the Senate S. 2323, relating to ceded lands on the Fort Hall Indian Reservation, that a clerical error appearing therein may be corrected.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 11443. An act to extend the exemption from head tax to citizens of Newfoundland entering the United States;

H. R. 11928. An act for the relief of James T. Kilbreth, George R. Bidwell, and Nevada N. Stanahan, as collectors of customs for the district and port of New York; and

H. R. 5511. An act to authorize registers and receivers of the United States land offices to furnish transcripts of their records to individuals.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

S. 577. An act to confirm and legalize prior admissions to citizenship of the United States where the judge or clerk of the court administering the oath to the applicant or his witnesses has failed to sign or send the record, oath, or the judgment of admission, and to establish a proper record of such citizenship.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BATES].

Mr. BATES. Mr. Chairman, the existence, growth, and development of free rural delivery are the best evidences in recent years that this is a government of the people and for the people. This service has been called a "luxury." It is more than that; and so eagerly has it been sought after in all portions of this country and so thoroughly appreciated wherever its benefits have been bestowed that it has come to be regarded as a necessity by the millions of people who enjoy it.

As late as June 30, 1902, there were only some 8,000 rural routes established, and on the 1st day of April, 1904, there will be 21,962 rural routes in operation in this country, apportioned among the several States and Territories of the Union largely in proportion to the number of petitions received.

It is my belief that the $21,000,000 appropriated in this behalf brings more direct benefit to the inhabitants of this Republic whom it affects than almost any other appropriation made by the General Government.

Forty years ago everyone went or sent to the post-office for his mail, and the farmer in the busy season, when his horses and teams were working in the fields, could sometimes only receive mail for himself and family possibly once a week—on Saturday afternoon. Now it is not only delivered several times daily at the homes and places of business of the inhabitants of more than a thousand cities, but for the last six months of the fiscal year (January 1 to June 30, 1903) there were delivered by the carriers of this service some 310,000,000 pieces of mail on rural routes throughout the United States to farmers and inhabitants of sparsely settled regions.

Increased facilities always bring increased use and enjoyment—more letters are written and received; more newspapers and magazines are subscribed for. While it is not true in every part of the country, yet the official report shows that quite a number of rural routes already pay for themselves by the additional revenues they occasion.

INCREASED VALUE TO FARM LANDS OF THE COUNTRY.

The testimony adduced from all over the country proves that by reason of rural free delivery the actual value of our farm lands has been increased. Many farmers state that they would not dispense with the service for $50 or even $100 per annum. It has been estimated that the value of farm lands has risen by this means as high as $5 per acre in several States. A moderate benefit to the farm lands of the whole country would be from $1 to $3 per acre.

BETTER PRICES FOR FARM PRODUCTS.

The producers, being brought into daily touch with the state of the markets and in better communication with those who buy their products, are able to obtain better prices for all that the farm produces. More definite knowledge of trade conditions is always of great advantage.

GOOD ROADS ENCOURAGED.

Good roads have been built and induced as an incentive for rural free-delivery establishment and to better encourage their maintenance. The Department wisely states that as a prerequisite to the granting of the benefits of rural free delivery there must be good passable roads at all seasons of the year. In many localities the farmers have taken the matter of good roads into their own hands, and through their pathmasters and supervisors have lowered grades, built bridges, turned waterways, and aided in this way the general communication between different points.

The number of routes established can not, in the very nature of things, be exactly in proportion to the population of each State. The demand for the service, the use made of it after it is established, and the condition of the highways and topographical fitness of the country all govern in the consideration of the petition of citizens.

FREE DELIVERY OPPOSED BY LAST DEMOCRATIC ADMINISTRATION.

During the last Administration of President Cleveland the system of rural free delivery was condemned and rejected by the House Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and under the same Administration, in 1894, Postmaster-General Bissell refused to make use of the appropriation of $10,000 offered him to inaugurate the service, stating that the project was impracticable and unwise. The entire service has been practically established and built up within the last seven years, until it has become one of the most beneficent, wise, and useful items of legislation provided by the Federal Congress. The alacrity and unanimity with which it has been asked for and used by the people at large is conclusive proof of its benefit and wisdom.

OTHER FACILITIES OF RURAL FREE DELIVERY.

Every one of the nearly 22,000 rural carriers is a traveling post-office, making daily calls at the homes of our citizens. They receive mail for registration and furnish a proper receipt therefor. They may accept money for money orders, sell postage stamps, postal cards, and stamped envelopes. They may deliver registered matter, special-delivery letters and packages, and when a pension letter is in their hands it must be delivered to the pensioner in person at the door of patron's house, if within 1 mile of the route.

I congratulate not only the Post-Office Committee but the entire country on the very efficient manner in which the rural free-delivery service has been inaugurated and established all over this land and on the great benefits daily accruing from its use among the people. [Loud applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND].

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, I have asked permission to occupy a few minutes of the committee's time to give notice that I propose to offer two amendments to the bill under consideration, and to state briefly my reasons for the same.

Of all the institutions connected with the Federal Government none touches the people so closely and brings them so much benefit and satisfaction as the Post-Office Department. No other aids so much in educating and improving the people. Through it flows the streams of information which fertilize every community, and the products of the printing press are carried to the people to comfort, enlighten, and instruct.

The development of the postal facilities has been the development of the people in wisdom and greatness. When those facilities reached but a few and at wide intervals, it was a blessing; the tardy letter carried by canal and horses from the East to the western frontier at great expense was a blessing, and when steam was harnessed to the mails and delivered its precious freight at the larger cities and towns to which the people went for miles around to get a weekly paper the benefits were still greater, and larger yet did they become when business men in large cities could receive their mail several times a day, even at their desks, by city carriers.

But not until very recent years was it discovered that the people whose money pays the majority of all taxes levied for Government purposes; who constitute the majority of the people; from whose ranks are recruited armies and navies in time of war; in whom the hope of the nation rests for that stability and wisdom which is unmoved by new and untried schemes, and in whom is cast a safe anchor when storms of corruption and squalls of political delusions beat against the ship of state; not until recent years have any of these people from the country received the benefits of free delivery, and not nearly all of those do now; and yet, judged by policy or right, is any class more entitled to the benefits of free delivery? Where municipalities are being crowded and congested by people drawn from the country and from foreign lands it is the part of wisdom to encourage life in the country: and with electric roads, telephones, and rural delivery the benefits of city life have been extended to the limits of these facilities, municipal boundaries have been removed, and the benefits of the country have invaded the city.

Gentlemen have talked as though they had made concessions to the country by making provisions for the extension of rural service, when in reality they have simply allowed the rural districts a portion of their own.

We are told that there is liable to be a deficit. Possibly that is true, but in the end I am sure that rural delivery will be more than self-supporting. The total receipts of the Post-Office Department have been largely increased since rural delivery was established, and every route report which I have examined, and I have investigated many, shows a steady increase in pieces of mail handled and in stamps sold and canceled; yet this cancellation and sale of stamps does not measure the whole effect of rural delivery; its benefits reach every other department, and much of the general increase can be traced to rural delivery.

But is it necessary that the system shall be self-supporting to entitle it to the support of Congress? Do we maintain schools, found and support colleges because they are self-supporting, or do we provide for general education because that people is greatest and most prosperous which is best educated, and that state most enduring which rests on the foundation of intelligence? And yet I know of no educational influence more far-reaching in its effects, more practical in its results, than that of rural delivery. Have we appropriated a hundred million for the increase and support of our Navy, whose benefits are at least doubtful to the minds of millions of our people, and for the avowed purpose of overawing European nations into respect for the United States—have we done this with the idea that we shall get financial returns to pay for the investment? Have we appropriated millions more on the District of Columbia as an investment upon which we hope to receive dividends? Or have we spent much for the convenience of the people of the District and to satisfy our national pride?

Having done this, shall we now say that our money is gone and we can not appropriate so much as the cost of one battle ship, without which we have thus far for a hundred years maintained our dignity and rights upon sea and land? Shall we, I repeat, say that we can not spend so much as the cost of one battle ship to extend the benefits of rural delivery and pay its carriers living wages, when such extension would do more to keep the nation protected against foreign foes by increasing the intelligence, and therefore the efficiency, of the people, who must finally man those ships, than all the navies built by all our millions?

Shall we be more lavish with the peoples' money in providing for the comfort and convenience of the few who are anxious to live in Washington than we are to give to the people that which is their own, and which they demand?

We have had deficiencies in the Post-Office Department before, and yet it has finally changed the balance, and it will do so again, but whether it does or not we can better curtail appropriations in other directions and extend and improve rural delivery. I say the people demand this, and it is not safe to say that the thousands of petitioners who have asked Congress to extend and improve this service are not sincere and have been induced to ask for what they did not want. I want this service extended until every citizen living on a good road in a well-settled community, shall have free delivery of his mail. A fair provision seems to be made in the bill for extension of the service. At the proper time I shall offer an amendment to the pending bill asking that rural carriers be paid $850 per annum and be allowed fifteen days' vacation per year with pay. I shall do this because I believe it is right, and because I believe the people demand that it shall be done.

I know of no class of Government employees who bring so much satisfaction to the people, who work as hard, everything considered, and who receive so little pay as the rural carriers. Six days out of every seven during the last long winter in Michigan—and I refer to Michigan, because I know conditions there better—the carriers have through snow and ice and intensely cold weather carried the mail their average route of 24 miles for $50 a month. Much of the time they have broken their roads, and many and many a day they have been ten and twelve hours on the trip. They have kept two and three horses each; have been obliged to furnish two carriages, a wagon, and a sleigh, or else have a pair of runners to attach to their wagon body; and for their year's work they will have less money than the man who has worked on the farm during the same period, as proof of which I desire to make a short comparison, which I will state briefly and insert in the RECORD in full for your careful consideration.

The carrier has received from the Government $600 for his year's work.

He has expended for 2 horses, at $100	$200.00
1 wagon	60.00
1 pair runners for snow	6.00
1 harness	20.00
2 blankets, at $3 each	6.00
1 stove and fuel	8.00
200 bushels of oats, at 30 cents	60.00
8 tons of hay, at $8	64.00
4 tons of straw, at $4	16.00
12 months' horseshoeing, at $1.60 per month	19.20
Repairs on wagon and harness	5.00
Total expenses	464.20

Amount of salary over expenses, $136.80.

For the second year his account would be about as follows:

Received from the Government	$600.00
EXPENSES.
200 bushels of oats, at 30 cents	$60.00
8 tons of hay, at $8 per ton	64.00
4 tons of straw, at $4	16.00
12 months' shoeing, at $1.60 per month	19.20
1 blanket	3.00
Fuel for stove	6.00
Repairs	10.00
Interest on original outfit	27.24
Total expenses second year	205.44

Amount of salary over expenses, $394.56.

The third year his account would be about the same, only his repairs would be greater, and at the beginning of the fourth year he would require a new outfit. The salary he has received for the three years' work would be $136.80 plus $394.56 plus $394.56, or $925.92, or an average of $308.64 per year for himself and two horses, and he has had but two days' vacation.

Now, let us see what the farm laborer has received during the same time.

He has worked one hundred and eighty-two days from April 1 to November 1, at $1.25 per day, and received $227.50; one hundred and thirty days from November 1 to April 1, at $1 per day, $130, and for three hundred and twelve days he has received $357.50, as against $308.64 for our carrier and team, or $48.86 more.

Now, that is an advantage in favor of the farm laborer of $48.86.

Mr. COWHERD. Will the gentleman allow me?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. COWHERD. The gentleman, I take it, is arguing that even this amount fixed by the committee, $720 a year, is too small.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. COWHERD. Does the gentleman know that to-day we are having identically the same service done on the star routes, over routes 25 miles long, where the mail is delivered to every patron and collected from every patron, at an annual cost of $450 a year?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not know that, and neither do I care. If that is being done, it is being done for too little money, and that is no argument against a reasonable salary to rural carriers.

Mr. COWHERD. Does it not show what it costs where you let out the work to competitive bidding?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Well, we are not doing that kind of business now. We are employing rural carriers.

Mr. COWHERD. Is not that a fair illustration? Ought not the Government to get the work done as cheaply as it can, where it can get it done properly? And I say that on star routes 25 miles in length, where the mail is delivered every day to every patron and collected every day from every patron, it now costs $450 a year.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understand that the Government is trying for some reason or other to change the star-route system and supply the mail on those routes by rural delivery. I also believe that it is the duty of this Government to pay those men what their services are worth. If the gentleman believes this Government ought to let all these contracts to the lowest bidder for doing all the work of the Government, he would find himself in utter confusion if that were done, because the fact is that much of the salaried work that is done in this country, and all of the government offices that are held by gentlemen in this country, could be done and held for much less than is being paid at the present time.

Mr. COWHERD. I will say that for myself I believe so strongly that the mail ought to be delivered by the contract service that I was one of the committee that brought such a bill before the House; one that we said would prevent not only this great political machine, but would save untold millions of dollars a year to the people of this country.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not know how it is in other parts of the country, but up in the State of Michigan—and I suppose it is the same everywhere—we have intelligent men doing this work, men whose time is worth more than $720 a year, and they are leaving the service because they are insufficiently paid. I maintain that it can not be done and done well under the present system for $720 a year. I will say that, as my colleague from Michigan [Mr. BISHOP] has suggested to me, the star-route carriers also carry passengers and freight to increase their compensation.

Mr. COWHERD. The rural carrier also is permitted to carry passengers.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The bill proposes to cut that out.

Mr. COWHERD. He is permitted to carry them now.

Mr. TOWNSEND. He does not carry passengers for pay.

Mr. COWHERD. He is permitted to carry them, and in some places he does carry them.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Very few, if any. The fact of the matter is, as I said a moment ago, I do not believe that any gentleman who knows all the circumstances and all the expenses to which these carriers are subjected will contend before this committee that the rural carriers are getting what they ought to have for the work which they do.

Eight hundred and fifty dollars is too small a sum, and I have asked and hoped that rural carriers might receive the same salary as our efficient city carriers. But I offer the amendment as a compromise, believing that the carriers can make that sum do until Congress shall be in a more magnanimous mood and grant them what they deserve. The present salary has compelled many of our best carriers to resign in order that they might engage in more remunerative work, and every such resignation is a detriment to the service. And it is no argument at all to say that hundreds stand ready to take their places, for I answer, as I did the gentleman from Indiana the other day, and say that every office under the Government could be readily filled if the salary were cut in two, and patriots could be found in plenty to occupy the present office buildings in Washington without alterations or improvements. These carriers should be allowed fifteen days' vacation with pay the same as other Government employees, and their substitutes should be allowed to do their work.

The people will approve of such action, the service will be improved, and justice will be more nearly done. [Loud applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of making a speech, but merely to make a statement in justice to a very distinguished constituent of mine who was wronged, unintentionally, I hope, yesterday on this floor.

We have all, Mr. Chairman, arrived at the point where we fully recognize and universally concede the great benefits that have come to the people of this country from rural free delivery. Consequently, Mr. Chairman, a number of gentlemen have sprung up who are not quite so frank as was my colleague from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS], who addressed the committee before me this afternoon, and who claim more that he did, namely, that he is the "stepfather" of this great system.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of record—I have the proof in my hand and will put it in the RECORD in connection with my remarks, again repeating it, so that the gentlemen who are disposed to forget it will have no further excuse for doing so—that the first law ever passed by this body authorizing rural free delivery was introduced and urged on this floor by my distinguished constituent, Hon. Thomas E. Watson, of Georgia, who then represented the district in Congress I now represent. During the second session of the Fifty-second Congress, while the post-office appropriation bill was before the House, on February 17, 1893, Mr. Watson offered the following amendment:

Amend the paragraph so as to read, as follows:

"For free-delivery service, including existing experimental free-delivery offices, $11,254,900, of which the sum of $10,000 shall be applied, under the direction of the Postmaster-General, to experimental free delivery in rural communities other than towns and villages."

Mr. Watson offered this amendment, and it was conceded on this floor by the chairman of the committee, Mr. Henderson, of North Carolina, and by Mr. Holman, of Indiana, that there was then no existing law for this appropriation, and the point of order was reserved against it. In fact it is undoubtedly true that the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, Mr. Watson, is unquestionably the author of the first law authorizing rural free delivery in this country. I therefore make these remarks, Mr. Chairman, as a mere matter of justice to a distinguished citizen of my own State, who is justly entitled to this credit, about which there seems to be some confusion.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That amendment got on the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; it was adopted. The point of order that it was new legislation was first reserved against it, was conceded to be good, and finally was not insisted upon.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I ask permission of the House to extend these remarks so that I can put these facts into the RECORD, with my remarks, so that gentlemen now may be reminded of the historical truth of this matter and Mr. Watson may be given the credit for beginning this great work so useful and important to the people, a credit to which he is entitled by every rule of justice and fair play.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARDWICK. The record is as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

"For free-delivery service, including existing experimental free-delivery offices, $11,254,943."

Mr. WATSON. I have an amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Amend the paragraph so as to read as follows:

"'For free-delivery service, including existing experimental free-delivery offices, $11,254,900, of which the sum of $10,000 shall be applied, under the direction of the Postmaster-General, to experimental free delivery in rural communities other than towns and villages.'"

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. WATSON. This reduces the expenditure provided for in the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I desire to reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order has already been reserved.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, the paragraph under consideration provides for the expenditure of $11,254,943 for free-delivery service. My amendment reduces the amount of that expenditure and simply directs that the Postmaster-General shall apply $10,000 of the appropriation to experimental free delivery in rural communities.

Mr. LOUD. That is already provided for; the gentleman will accomplish nothing by his amendment.

Mr. WATSON. It is not provided for in rural districts other than towns and villages.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. The experiment is going on now.

Mr. LOUD. And has been for two years. Nothing can be gained by the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. WATSON. There is no experimental service in rural communities other than villages and towns.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. You mean "truly rural."

Mr. WATSON. Yes, sir; the real country.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the amendment will again be read. It was not understood.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think there is some misapprehension as to the law on this subject. I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina in charge of this bill what the existing law is?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. There is no law on the subject providing for rural free delivery or experiments in that direction. There is a law which provides for experiments in small towns and villages, and forty-eight of these now have free delivery. That condition is preserved in this bill. But no provision is made for rural free delivery.

Mr. WATSON. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the point of order will not be insisted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. No point of order was submitted; it was only reserved.

Mr. WATSON. It was made under a misapprehension of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. So far as I am individually concerned, Mr. Chairman, I would have no objection to such an experiment. But I thought it proper to reserve the point of order, not knowing what other gentlemen might think of it.

Mr. LOUD. Are you satisfied in your own mind that this is not substantially the present law?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I am not entirely satisfied.

Mr. CALDWELL. There is no provision for rural districts.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Oh, I am perfectly satisfied that there is no law in regard to experimental delivery in rural districts.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 49, noes 50.

Mr. WATSON. No quorum.

The Chair appointed as tellers Mr. Watson and Mr. Henderson of North Carolina.

Mr. WATSON. I would like to have a few moments, with unanimous consent, to make a statement in reference to this matter.

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless by unanimous consent, pending a division no debate is in order.

Mr. WATSON. I have asked unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman proceeding briefly in explanation of this proposition?

There was no objection.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LOUD. Does the gentleman withdraw the point of no quorum?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not so understand.

Mr. LOUD. Then I shall object.

Several MEMBERS. Too late.

Mr. CALDWELL. I make the point of order that the gentleman is too late. Unanimous consent has been given.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman is too late.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, the present law provides for an experimental free delivery in rural communities; but as I understand it—and the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Henderson], makes the same statement to the House—the law has been construed to mean cities, towns, and villages, and there are now in operation experimental free deliveries in certain towns and villages.

The law expressly provides for rural communities, and it seems to me where the general laws make such provision there is no hardship in taking a small amount from this appropriation, only $10,000, and appropriating it for experimental free delivery in absolutely rural communities, that is to say, in the country pure and simple, amongst the farmers, in those neighborhoods where they do not get their mail more than once in every two weeks, and where these deserving people have settled in communities one hundred years old, and do not receive a newspaper that is not two weeks behind the times.

The amendment proposes not to increase the appropriation; it actually diminishes it by a nominal amount, but takes $10,000 of it to be provided for experimental free delivery in absolutely rural communities, instead of towns and villages, which the authorities construe to mean rural communities. In other words, I think that a part of the money ought to be spent in the country, where the law provides it shall be spent, and having made this statement, if we can have another division, and the committee is against my amendment, I will yield to its will.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the only law on the subject at all is in the very language used in this appropriation bill:

"For free-delivery service, including existing experimental free-delivery offices."

That is all the law now on the statute books in regard to this question.

I did not want the statement of the gentleman from Georgia in regard to there being a law on the statutes as to rural free delivery to go without correction.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, this delivery in the small towns and villages is called rural free delivery.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. But as a matter of fact there is no law except what is stated here in this appropriation bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word about this matter. The district which I have the honor to represent is situated in the midst of a great intelligent body of farmers, and so far as I am informed the sentiment is generally that this would be an unnecessary expense. It has been discussed somewhat in the public prints.

This amendment means an increased appropriation of $10,000. Upon its face it simply diverts $10,000 from the proper fund, but it has of course got to be made up. I am very confident that the people of this country do not care to have the taxes imposed upon them increased by what they deem to be an unnecessary expense.

A MEMBER. Do I understand the gentleman from Indiana to say there is no circulation of mail among the farmers of his district? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is dividing. Debate is not in order. Does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] insist upon his point of no quorum?

Mr. WATSON. I stated that if we could have a rising vote, I would submit to the decision of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Chair will again put the amendment to the committee.

The committee again divided, and there were—ayes 79, noes 41.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BADGER].

Mr. BADGER. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I shall occupy five minutes in what I desire to say. I do not desire to inflict upon the House any set speech upon this subject. But it has occurred to my mind, Mr. Chairman, that some of our Members do not seem to fully appreciate the responsibilities, and the necessities, I might say, of our system of carriers, both our rural free-delivery and our city carriers.

As to their salaries, I do not think they are paid enough; and, Mr. Chairman, if it would not jeopardize the provision for the increase of the salaries for the rural free-delivery carriers, I think it would be proper for some Member—I would like to take the responsibility myself—to introduce an amendment to this bill increasing as well the salaries of our city carriers and the clerks in our Post-Office Department. There are none of them paid enough.

The responsibilities of the city carriers are very great, and the good that results from a practical service can not be measured in a few dollars and cents, and I hope to see this bill amended accordingly, but that will come later on, when I hope to have something to say and hope to offer something in the line suggested by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], who has just spoken on this subject. There is one thing I do not desire should go unchallenged here this afternoon. My friend from Georgia

[Mr. GRIGGS] and my friend from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] seem to have overlooked something when they jumped on the carriers and the national organizations of carriers and say that they have no right to petition, no right to say anything in regard to their matters, and had introduced an Executive order here purporting to prohibit any carrier or organization of carriers or their officers of this Department from bringing before this body or any other Department its grievances except through the head of a Department. This is an astounding proposition to me.

Since I was 21 years old I have devoted myself to the study and practice of the law and the administration of the law, and I have yet to be convinced that any American citizen or any class of American citizens have not the right of free speech and the right of petition for any of their rights, and even the right to remonstrate against any injustice. That order, if it is put in the light as contended for by these gentlemen, violates the very spirit of our American institutions. Why, it certainly was not intended in that light. I hope it will never be interpreted in that light. I hope no such order will ever be used to infringe on and curtail the rights of American citizenship. Now, then, as to one other branch of this subject:

A rural carrier in our portion of the State is not only the servant of the Government by reason of his position, but also a servant of the patrons to whom he delivers the mail, and he is largely the servant of our merchants, our wholesale people and our manufacturers, publishers, and the great mercantile world generally who have connection with our rural districts, and in my own district I will almost guarantee that the manufacturers and wholesale and mercantile houses have, before this rural system was in vogue, expended almost as much in sending their advertisements and placing their goods before the people as is now paid for the whole carrier system in my district, and they are willing and anxious that these carriers should be paid fair compensation for their services. This great expense formerly incurred by the business world is now obviated or greatly reduced by reason of the carrier service.

It is not the carriers who are asking it alone, but it is the patrons of the offices, the men in the country, the merchants in our city, and the manufacturers—the great business world and all who are engaged in any considerable line of business who desire to promote the efficiency of the service—and they desire to pay what it is worth and at the same time advance our general interests. The rural carrier is not getting now what he deserves; he is not getting what his position demands; and I hope, my friends, that no point of order will ever prevail against this provision in the bill granting an increase to at least the amount, $720, named in this bill and as much more as Members may vote, and whatever that may be it will not be any too much for the men who perform this duty and help along in this branch of our Government.

One word more on this line. Why should we be penurious in this? Why, this is part of one of the great branches of the Government that pays the Government something from a business standpoint. Our Army and Navy, of both of which we are proud—and whenever anything comes up for their benefit in the way of an appropriation bill we vote for it, and justly do so. I vote for all of them in reason and will do so over and over again as long as I have the opportunity. But why should we be penurious with the carriers and clerks in our Post-Office Department? Our Post-Office Department brings into the Treasury of the Government almost as much revenue as it takes to sustain that Department. Take, for instance, my own city. It pays clear to the Government nearly $400,000 every year more than the local expenses of running the city department. It is well managed and more than self-sustaining. The whole system is almost a self-sustaining one, and why curtail its usefulness or in any way cramp its progress? Why be penurious in this? There is no economy in being penurious, and there is nothing patriotic in it, my friends.

Let us look out in broad lines of progressive American citizenship and American patriotism. Let our rural carriers continue to be the agents for our newspapers, the great vehicles of civilization and progress. Let them help circulate the newspapers, and what financial remuneration they receive for that may go to pay some of the expenses that they must necessarily incur in discharging their duties. The way this bill now contemplates curtailing their privileges and field of usefulness there would not be perquisites enough in a rural carrier's job to give him the finances to pay for the axle grease he wears out on the axles of his wagon.

I believe the carriers should have full scope to act as agents for the newspapers and help both the publisher and his patrons in that regard, so long as it does not interfere with or impede the prompt delivery of the mail. Increase their salaries; keep step to step with the lines we started in when this branch was founded.

Take as an example how efficient our city carrier service has grown from a small beginning. Increase the pay of the boys who do the work, and make both carrier systems even better for the carriers, the patrons, and the General Government. We have a splendid service in our cities and a growing service in the rural free delivery, but we should ever remember the boys who do the work and let their pay increase as their efficiency has already increased, and we will have both carrier branches in that progressive condition that we may regard them as the greatest and most practical branches of our civil government. I now regard them as among the greatest and most practical branches of our Government. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

[Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON].

[Mr. JOHNSON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES].

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words on the pending measure and speak on the subject of rural free delivery and letter carriers in general. I noted with surprise when I came to look at the bill before us that the annual allowance for a rural free-delivery carrier is to be but $720 for the ensuing year. I have not the slightest doubt but that legislation in the way of amendment should and will be attached to this bill granting a much more liberal allowance for this branch of the service. I have been surprised to learn from the statements that have been made throughout the debate on this bill that there are Members who seem inclined to think that $720 per year is plenty, and some of them did not hesitate to say that it is entirely too much. There are gentlemen here who have intimated that in their district it is comparatively easy to get men, any quantity of men, to perform this service for the people for much less money.

I have to say, gentlemen, that if this feature of the mail service is to become a permanent one in the district which I represent and all that country it adjoins, the wages for this service for this rural free delivery of mail will have to be materially increased. It is true that we have been successful so far in getting men to go on with this service, but they have done it because they did not believe that the United States of America would continue to offer such a miserable pittance to an American citizen engaged in such responsible and arduous employment.

I say that with full knowledge of the facts, despite the Executive order which has been issued to prevent a rural free-delivery carrier or his representative from approaching a Congressman.

I know how they feel on that subject, and I am saying this in warning to the people who are charged with the responsibility of this legislation. These men can get better and far more remunerative employment where I reside than the Government offers them. However it is going to affect other districts, I can speak for mine. The city carriers, too, have claims upon this committee, and the city carriers' compensation should have been increased in this bill. I do not see how any man on this floor can stand up and give a reason why the pay of the postal carriers of the United States in the cities have not been increased this year. Has it come about that Members on the other side of the Chamber, who are responsible to these men for the increased cost of living and who with lavish hands spend the money of the Government, must begin curtailing and economizing on the noblest body in the public service—the men who have the confidence of the people they serve, the men who all through this scandal which touched so many branches of the service were passed over and left unsullied?

Are we to commence economizing on them? "Executive orders," they say. There is no Executive order, it seems, to prevent a Congressman going to the head of a Department and having an allowance made for a post-office or for clerk hire, which is in plain violation of the law. I don't say that there should not be an Executive order preventing a mail carrier from approaching a Congressman; I do not doubt its wisdom; but there is more need of an order to prevent a Representative from going to the head of a Department and warping the judgment of men who are supposed to make the allowances according to the laws and regulations and without regard to the wishes or opinions of Members of Congress.

Executive orders! There is no Executive order which prevents a railroad company from going before the postal committee or coming by its representative on the floor of this House and showing Congress that it is necessary to appropriate $100,000 for special facilities which nobody seems to see the necessity of and nobody knows anything about. Special facilities for what? Does anybody mean to state these trains would cease to run or slack their speed if we knocked that appropriation out of the present bill? Let us try it. Make your Executive order to the railroad and to the lobbyist. Extend your Executive order, if you please, so that it will prevent the mail carrier from asking me as a Congressman to get up in my place and demand upon this floor fair treatment for him, but extend it to the lobbyist, the railroad, and to the Congressmen themselves. [Applause.]

We have heard it stated here to-day that under the contract system this business could be handled much more cheaply than it is at present, and no doubt this is true. But the same argument applies to nearly every work carried on by the Government, and there are people who do not hesitate to say that it even applies to Members of this House and that there can be found men who would be glad to take the places of Members of this body for considerably less than the salary now paid to them and thereby save a considerable sum of money to the Government; but there are other considerations which enter into the selection of officers of our Government than those of economy.

But that question is entirely out of place in this discussion. The rural free delivery is not a contract system. The Government is employing these men directly and itself fixes the wages of the rural and the city carriers. Does anyone expect that either branch of the service will attract men to it who have the intelligence, the education, and the integrity which they now possess in such a high degree unless they are paid a compensation sufficient to enable them to pay their way, educate their children, and live as we are taught to believe American citizens should live?

We have now a force of postal employees that we can justly be proud of. The skill which they bring to bear upon their duties are the proud boast of American citizens the world over. Why should they not be paid commensurately with the services they render? There are many Departments of the Government which will bear watching, but, believe me, the American people, who come in daily contact with these men and who have grown to depend on them, will not look with favor upon a cheese-paring policy so far as they are concerned.

A 20 per cent increase in the pay of letter carriers would hardly leave them where they were before. The cost of living has increased more than that and it has been brought about by legislation admittedly framed for the purpose of permitting higher prices, in the belief that wages would necessarily go up in accordance therewith. Why don't you put up the wages of these men whom you forbid taking any step to help themselves?

I have not seen a single representative of theirs, nor have I been asked to take any action in their behalf; but I know many of them personally. Among them I am proud to number some of my closest friends, and I say to you, gentlemen, that you are not treating them fairly. They may not even ask for what any man in this land may demand and follow up its refusal by a strike.

They are between the upper and nether millstones, and between high prices and low wages are being oppressed to such a degree that they must soon lose that pride and dignity which is the possession of him only who knows that his energy, integrity, and ability are properly appraised and appreciated—dignity without which no man can do the best that is in him, either in the Government service or out of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I see by the clock that it is nearly half past 5. I wanted to read and comment upon an article, which I hold in my hand, from the Brooklyn Eagle, but instead of doing so I shall ask unanimous consent to insert the article in the RECORD. It is from the Brooklyn Eagle of March 13, signed by Frederick Boyd Stevenson, upon the subject of "The approaching deficit and its causes."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the article which he has alluded to. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The article referred to above is as follows:

[The Brooklyn Daily Eagle, New York, Sunday, March 13, 1904.]

Congress is called upon to deal with a deficit of $42,000,000 as the direct result of a long reign of riotous recklessness. The situation marks the climax of an Administration that has broken all records in the wasteful expenditure of public money. The billion-dollar Congress of notorious memory, at its most expensive session, spent $232,000,000 less than this present session of Congress aims to appropriate.

Millions have been poured into Government rat holes like water.

The insatiable maw of the Army has acquired $77,000,000 to appease it, and the itching palms of the railroads and the steamship owners are again reaching for their bit out of $15,500,000 for transporting troops and supplies in a time of slumbrous peace.

The Navy Department, with a lump sum of $15,000,000 for "machinery," to say nothing of the $82,000,000 required to keep its wheels greased and its whistles wet in 1904, now asks for $102,000,000 for 1905. And in the meantime the steel trust is figuring on million-dollar chances in the bills asking for $28,000,000 for "fortifications, armor, and armaments."

The city of St. Louis has just secured a gratuitous contribution of $4,600,000 to add to the more than generous appropriations already granted by the Government.

From $50,000 to $200,000—the exact sum is concealed under the euphonious title of "engines of war"—have been cheerfully given and as cheerfully spent on flying machines that fail to fly, and recently a proposition was made in all seriousness before Congress that the Government appropriate $25,000 for the purchase of a collection of butterflies industriously captured in the flower-topped fields of Pennsylvania by a grand old Grand Army man, who was an all-around good fellow and hard-working ward worker, now defunct, whose widow needed the money.

From such attempts as this to reach the hearts of the statesmen and the deposit vaults in the Treasury it is but a step to the placing in the departmental libraries of a complete line of French novels for the delectation of Government clerks who suffer with ennui during their six or seven hours of waiting for the time ball to drop.

Customs ports are maintained where it costs hundreds of dollars to collect $1. From the higher officers down to the cheapest clerk demands have been made for increases in salaries.

Extra pay has been voted to men for extra work performed during the hours when they were supposed to be doing labor for which they are paid good salaries by the Government. Expensive horses and carriages and smart-looking coachmen have been maintained for private use at public expense by the heads of Departments and Cabinet officers, and in some instances Government funds have paid the private butlers of high officials.

Thus on every hand—from those in the seats of authority to the humblest sweeper on the Capitol steps—there seems to be but one aim in life: "Get all you can out of Uncle Sam!" It is this state of affairs that has caused the great deficit.

Since 1875 the expenses of the country have shot upward almost in a straight line. The story is forcibly told in the figures of the last year of Cleveland's Administration—1896—when it cost $457,088,344 to run the Government, and those of to-day which show the estimates for 1904 to be $747,317,922.

What is the cause of it?

Representative HEMENWAY, the bright young Republican from Indiana, who succeeds "Uncle Joe" CANNON as chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations, says it is reckless expenditure.

Representative ROBINSON, also from Indiana, says it is flying machines, frivolities, and foolish fads.

"The big leaks are in the Army and Navy," says Representative HITCHCOCK, of Nebraska.

But Commissioner West, of the District of Columbia, insists that the deficit is due to a plague of national spendthrifts whom the profane call "grafters," who have become so used to big figures in appropriation bills that they can not appreciate the meaning of a million when they hear it.

As for the common herd which pays the freight, perhaps it may be interested in a calm, dispassionate investigation of some of the things for which the country pays so dearly.

THE SERIOUS DILEMMA THAT FACES THE NATION.

One man who thoroughly realizes the reckless manner in which the public money is being expended is Representative JAMES A. HEMENWAY, of Indiana, chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations. He sees that the present way of conducting the financial affairs of the nation will lead to dangerous difficulties. Since the opening of this session of Congress he has striven in every possible way to induce the Departments to cut down their estimates and reduce expenses. On nearly every side he has been met with stubborn resistance. Wherever he has seen a leak he has tried to stop it, but at each attempt at retrenchment there has gone forth a mighty wail from the army of spenders that threatens to carry him and his committee from the high moral ground they have attempted to maintain.

"The proposition is just here," said Mr. HEMENWAY, "we must find some way to reduce the estimated expense of conducting this Government by at least $42,000,000. The estimated expenses for the ensuing fiscal year are $747,317,922. The total revenues for the fiscal year beginning July 1 next are $704,472,000. Now, it doesn't require much of a mathematician to figure out that we have a deficit of $42,845,862. The big problem that is now before us becomes all the more serious when we know that at the last session Congress appropriated, exclusive of deficiencies, within less than $10,000,000 all that was submitted in the estimates, and that at the first session of the last Congress, which corresponds to this session, the appropriations, exclusive of deficiencies and the large sum of $50,130,000 for the isthmian canal, approached the estimates within a little less than $24,000,000.

"There is no comfort for us in the fact that the total estimates, excluding the sinking fund submitted in the last Congress, were at the first session $19,672,311 less than the estimated revenues, and at the last session $44,310,887 less than the estimated revenues. It only argues this point: That we now have no latitude to appropriate beyond the lines laid down in the regular estimates, and that those lines must be greatly contracted.

"Three of our great Government supply bills—the pension, legislative executive, and judicial, and the army—carry an aggregate of $242,000,000 nearly one-third of the entire annual estimates, as presented to us by the executive, but in their sum total they show a reduction of only $4,116,623. Now, if that ratio of reduction is not materially increased, the expenses for the next fiscal year can be met only by making heavy inroads on the surplus in the Treasury. The available cash balance in the Treasury is at present $229,000,000, and it is likely to be materially diminished before long on account of these payments: The isthmian canal, $50,000,000; unexpended balance of appropriations for increase of the Navy, $27,000,000; rivers and harbors, $37,000,000; public buildings, $17,000,000. You will see, therefore, that if our outstanding obligations, fixed by appropriations already made, were liquidated, the net cash in the Treasury would be reduced to the dangerously low mark of $98,000,000. That would be a sum less than it has reached at any period since the era of depression just before Mr. McKinle's first Administrationy.

"We must not forget, moreover, that we have to provide at this session for $60,804,821 on contract obligations appropriated by the last Congress on account of public works. This means that we must begin to draw the line somewhere. Our receipts ought to be equal to our expenditures. That is simply a matter of plain, common-sense business. We have been running to woeful extravagances, and it is high time to call a halt. For the first time since the war we have passed the legislative, the judicial, and the executive bills without raising the salaries of employees. This was not because the raises were not asked for. From every Department, from the head sometimes, down, came demands for more pay. The higher officials unblushingly ask that they receive more remuneration for their services. Why, the request for more pay for clerks and other employees came even from the Executive Department. In all there were 796 demands for increases in salaries, but in no instance was an increase granted by this committee. Instead of increasing the pay, we found it absolutely necessary to reduce it in as many cases as we could. The result is that we have cut off from the appropriation bill in reduced salaries $1,452,000. But the increase in salaries is only one of the little leaks. There are many more, and many of them run into millions."

"For instance, there is——?"

"Well, some of the insignificant customs ports are a useless expense to the Government. There is no reason whatever for maintaining them. Why, it costs nearly $600 to collect a fee of $1 at Galena, Ill., and there are forty-five of these ports where the expenses greatly exceed the receipts."

"But where does the leak of millions occur?"

"It is a pretty difficult matter to put your finger on the expenditure of millions and say that it ought not to be made. Of course it costs a great deal of money to run a country like the United States. And we can't afford to be niggardly. Now, as chairman of this committee, I am not in the cheese-paring business. Any legitimate expense that is for the good of the Government I am heartily in favor of. There is a great tendency to conceal the real purport of an appropriation under a general title. This must stop. An appropriation bill must come out in its true colors. The people want to know what the money is spent for. Of late years there has been a great tendency to crowd a lot of useless expenditures into the contingency bill. The contingency bill covers a multitude of foolishness and fads. Thousands of dollars of useless expenditures are covered up by it. Another practice has been for a Department to make a job lot of an appropriation. I am trying to insist that every appropriation must be made in detail.

"I am of the opinion that the Government is much too willing to spend money for matters that do not come within its scope. We have gone too readily into scientific research, and have paid for theories, when we ought to pay only for practical results. Take the theoretical work at the Naval Observatory and the scientific research and experiments at some of our other institutions. I should say, in round numbers, that it is costing us fully $100,000 a year more than it should for legitimate work. Then the Government is always buying something it does not need or putting up a public building that is not necessary. It is a very easy matter to spend millions in this way. But it is in the constant little leaks—in the things that are about us every day; things we don't notice—that the expenses roll up into the high figures."

Recently, on the floor of the House, Mr. HEMENWAY asserted that French novels and other books of fiction were to be found on the shelves of the libraries of the various Departments, the volumes of which were supposed to be devoted to purely technical subjects. After some discussion an amendment was passed that only professional books and periodicals should be purchased with Government funds for the departmental libraries.

"These books were procured at considerable extra expense, were they not?" I asked.

"I should say," replied Mr. HEMENWAY, "that the maintenance of the departmental libraries, including interest on the money invested in them, amounts to fully $200,000 a year. For my part I can not see why the great libraries of Washington do not answer all the purposes. The Congressional Library, the public library, and the libraries in the numerous institutions are the finest in the world, and I am sure one may find all he requires in them. I can not understand why it is necessary for every Department to maintain its own library. It certainly is not necessary for them to contain French novels.

"But this is not a popular job," added Mr. HEMENWAY. "The man who can deal out patronage and let the bills go through is the good fellow—not the man who is cutting down expenses."

HOW THE NATION'S EXPENSES HAVE BEEN EXPANDING.

Within the last few years the increase in the cost of conducting the affairs of the United States has been sensational. Making due allowances for the increase in population and natural expansion, the figures have been out of all proportion to what they should have been. The total appropriations for the Forty-third Congress, 1875-76, was $653,794,991, less by $93,000,000 than it is proposed to spend at one session of the present Congress. This, too, it must be borne in mind, is at a time when we have no war tax and no extraordinary public expenditures. The population of the country in 1875 was 50,000,000. According to the census of 1900 it was 75,000,000. In ratio to the increased population the appropriation bills for both sessions of the Fifty-eighth Congress should have been in the neighborhood of $980,000,000. Instead they are $1,500,000,000, fully $500,000,000 more than the natural increase would warrant.

During the years 1877 and 1878 the appropriations were reduced to $595,597,832, which included a special appropriation of $1,634,700 to increase the cavalry force to aid in suppressing Indian hostilities. In the next two years the appropriation ran up to $704,527,405. This increase was due mainly to a $5,500,000 fishery award, to $26,867,200 voted by special act for pension arrears, and to $2,090,000 for expenses of the United States courts omitted from the sundry civil act for 1880. In the next Congress the expenses climbed still higher, amounting to $727,537,684. These were the first years in which separate appropriations were made for the Agricultural Department, up to this time it having been provided for in the legislative acts. Then came the jump to $777,435,948—an increase of $50,000,000 in the Forty-seventh Congress.

In 1824 a great political-reform wave swept over the country and in 1885 Grover Cleveland was seated in the White House. The ends of a spendthrift Congress that had just passed out were quickly gathered together and the next appropriation bill was reduced to $655,269,402, showing an immediate cut of more than $122,000,000 in the running expenses of the Government during one Congress. When Harrison went in in 1889 the appropriations at once mounted to $794,146,424. Then followed the scandalous one-billion-dollar Congress and a cry went up from all parts of the country. But there was another break when Cleveland went back in 1893, and expenses were once more reduced, as well as they could be with the waste that was left in the track of the reckless Fifty-first Congress. The Republicans again got control. Then came the war with Spain and in the Fifty-fifth Congress even Reed's record was broken and we had a billion-and-a-half Congress. From that time forward the figures have not fallen far below the billion-and-a-half mark, and the indications are that the present Congress will not lower any high-water record of the past.

The fluctuations that appear on the diagram here presented do not redound to the thrift of a nation. They show, rather, a free and easy spending, as if with both hands.

Where have these billions gone?

Great sums of money are required to conduct the business of the Government. There is an honest outlay of millions of dollars each year. But other millions have been expended on foolish fads and ridiculous propositions that no shrewd business man would consider for a moment. Lax methods have prevailed that would wreck the strongest mercantile establishment in the world. It is impossible to go into all these leaks, some of which have been adroitly concealed, but enough of them may be exposed to indicate the reckless manner in which the affairs of the country are being conducted.

SINKING FORTUNES IN AIR SHIPS THAT CAN'T FLY.

Perhaps some day there may be air ships that really will sail in the air. The fever-heated imaginations of romancers have already pictured fierce aerial battle ships, darting like great birds of prey hither and yon through the ether, shooting forth fire and destruction in a war of the worlds. It must have been some such picture as this that spurred the supposedly sober and sedate War Department into the formation of a partnership with a modern Darius Green. As far back as 1895 Prof. S. P. Langley, of the Smithsonian Institution, claimed to have actually perfected a flying ship. Not long ago it was announced with great eclat that he was about to perform an experiment with a new model that would surely soar heavenward.

But the air ship did not circle around the steeples. Something broke, and it turned a double flip-flap and came down on its back in the mud, with its hind legs kicking in the air.

Somebody has been footing the bills. Uncle Sam went into his wallet for part of the expenses.

"We have received only $50,000 from the Government for experiments in air ships," said Prof. C. M. Manly, Professor Langley's assistant, in conversation with me the other day.

"It has cost the United States Government $200,000 to find out that Langley's flying machine can't fly," said Representative JAMES M. ROBINSON, of Indiana.

"You tell Langley for me," said Representative GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK, of Nebraska, "that the only thing he ever made fly was Government money."

Like many other expenditures of public money, those for the Langley air ship are said to be concealed in the ambiguous wording of the appropriation bill. In an act approved last March an appropriation was made for "fortifications and other works of defense." The expense of the Langley air ship experiments was provided for in this section:

"Board of Ordnance and Fortification: To enable the Board to make all needful and proper purchases, experiments, and tests, to ascertain with a view to their utilization by the Government, the most effective guns, small arms, cartridges, projectiles, fuses, explosives, torpedoes, armor plates, and other implements and engines of war, and to purchase or cause to be manufactured, under authority of the Secretary of War, such guns, carriages, armor plates, and other war material as may, in the judgment of the Board, be necessary in the proper discharge of the duty devolved upon it by the act approved September 22, 1888 * * * for the payment of the necessary expenses of the Board * * * and for the test of experimental guns, carriages, and other devices procured in accordance with the recommendation of the Board of Ordnance and Fortifications, $100,000, the expenditure of which shall be made by the several bureaus of the War Department heretofore having jurisdiction of the same, or by the Board itself, as the Secretary of War may direct." * * *

Under the terms "other implements and engines of war" and "other devices" it would be as easy to buy a flying machine as a 13-inch gun, and with a few appropriations like the one just quoted it would not be a difficult matter to drop in a few hundred thousand dollars without attracting particular attention. But an almost unlimited opportunity to purchase "queer things" has been afforded in the estimates for 1904-5 in the item of "fortification," which provides for expenditures of $15,004,420. There is a chance for a navy of air ships.

If one should call on Professor Langley, who is the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, the probabilities are one would not see him. One would be informed that Professor Langley is a very busy man. And doubtless that is so. Beside being at the head of the Smithsonian to all intents and purposes, the Blue Book shows that Professor Langley is keeper ex officio of the National Museum, director of the Astrophysical Observatory at Washington, member of the National Monument Association, director of the National Zoological Park, and director of the Bureau of American Ethnology.

But, busy as he is, Professor Langley has found time to write several dissertations on flying machines, which have been published at the Government Printing Office. One of the aerial stories is entitled "The Greatest Flying Creature." Within its fascinating pages, which are profusely illustrated, is described the Pterodactyl ornithostoma (the hero of the weird tale), after which Professor Langley has modeled his air ship.

"In former epochs of our planet's history there were larger flying creatures than now," begins Professor Langley, "notably the Pterodactyl, a brother to dragons, a reptile rather than a bird, but a reptile with enormously large wings."

Then the professor proceeds to give facts and figures to prove that there is no reason on earth why, if the Pterodactyl ornithostoma can fly, man shouldn't. Didn't Darius Green reason in the same line when he queried:

The birds can fly,
An' why can't I?

Among the other books of aerial adventure by Professor Langley, published at the Government Printing Office, are Story of Experiments in Mechanical Flight and The Langley Aerodrome, which contain elaborate plans and diagrams and descriptions of air ships in flight.

It was such stories as these, doubtless, that resulted in an investment of public funds in flying machines. Just how much has been put into them is a question. Recently an inquiry in Congress brought out a report from the Board of Ordnance and Fortification to the effect that tests of Doctor Langley's aerodrome were still in progress.

This report was made January 27, 1904, and the most exciting thing about it was the fact that Langley had cost the Government $50,000. The allotment was made in 1898, but Professor Langley is still making his test. It is admitted that the Smithsonian Institution had expended in addition to the amount named by the Board $23,000 on the Langley air ship. How much may be concealed in other appropriations and contingent funds no one seems to be able to find out.

OFFICIALS WHO RIDE IN GOVERNMENT COACHES.

Flying machines, however, are not the only means of transportation in Washington. There are coaches for officials which are paid for out of the public funds. Even Cabinet officers are not above riding in carriages bought with Uncle Sam's money, drawn by horses paid for out of the funds of the United States Treasury, and equipped with coachmen who are maintained at Government expense on falsified pay rolls as "laborers" and "messengers." Those who were caught at this petty business were the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and the Department of Justice.

One of the first acts of Grover Cleveland's Administration in 1885, when the Democratic party came into power, was to reform the official carriage abuse. One Cabinet officer after another ordered his horses and carriages sold, and the men who were acting as drivers and coachmen were put back at Government work. Upon the return of the Republicans there has been a steady increase in the number of official carriages, the majority of which are used for private and social purposes.

The man who first forcibly brought the attention of Congress to this abuse was Representative GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK, of Nebraska. Before that an amendment had been introduced by Representative C. B. LANDIS, of Indiana, eliminating horses and carriages to be used for private purposes from the appropriation bill. Mr. LANDIS, who, by the way, is a Republican, made the statement that the private carriages of public officials, maintained at Government expense, would reach from the White House to the Capitol. Representative HEMENWAY, the Republican chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations, admitted on the floor that he had been unable to ascertain by inquiry among the heads of the different Departments how many horses and carriages were maintained at public expense. Then it was that Representative HITCHCOCK introduced a series of resolutions addressed to each Cabinet officer requesting him to furnish to the House a statement "showing the number of horses, carriages, and automobiles maintained at Government expense for the officials of his Department, together with data showing the cost of said horses, carriages, automobiles, and harness, and the amount of wages paid to the men acting as coachmen, footmen, and chauffeurs, whether carried on the rolls as such or in some other classification."

The result of Mr. HITCHCOCK's resolutions was reports on the number of horses and carriages in use. In no instance was an automobile maintained at public expense. A summary of the reports shows:

Department.	Horses.	Cost.	Carriages.	Cost.	Coachmen.	Pay.
Commerce and Labor	8	$1,785	10	$4,250	4	$2,820
War	6	1,625	5	2,655	3	2,220
Post-Office	4	1,090	3	1,495	2	1,380
Justice	3	690	4	2,249	2	1,440
Navy	4	1,102	5	3,275	2	1,380
Treasury	7	1,900	6	3,660	7	4,620
Total	32	8,192	33	17,584	20	13,860

This is but a partial list of private horses and carriages maintained at the cost of the public, but it shows a total cost of $39,636, and a spirit of smallness that is far from becoming in a Cabinet officer of the United States. The average salary paid to the coachman is more than $50 a month. Good coachmen may be hired in Washington for $35 a month. But the most shameful part of the whole proceedings was the attempt to conceal the real nature of the coachmen's and the drivers' duties under false entries on the pay rolls. In not one instance in the reports received could it be shown that the men who were employed as coachmen and drivers for these private carriages were entered fairly and honestly on the public pay rolls in that capacity. Secretary of the Treasury L. M. Shaw was obliged to state in his report:

"There are assigned for driving and caring for the horses and carriages described seven men, who are borne on the rolls as laborers and receive compensation at the rate of $660 per annum each."

Postmaster-General H. C. Payne, in his signed report, says:

"The driver is carried on the rolls of the Department as a watchman, at a salary of $720 per annum, and his assistant is carried on the rolls as a laborer, at a salary of $660 per annum."

Secretary of the Navy William H. Moody says:

"One employee, carried on the rolls as an assistant messenger, at a compensation of $720 per annum, acts as driver for the Secretary. One employee, carried on the rolls as laborer, at $660 per annum, is used as driver for the Assistant Secretary."

Secretary George B. Cortelyou, of the Department of Commerce and Labor, says:

"Laborer, detailed to drive surrey and coupé, $660; assistant messenger, who acts as driver, $720; messenger, who acts as driver, $660; foreman of stables and driver to Secretary, $840."

A rather peculiar feature has been brought to light in connection with the horse and carriage service in Secretary Cortelyou's Department. Representative HITCHCOCK'S resolution was adopted January 18. On January 20 Secretary Cortelyou's Department was using twelve horses and fifteen carriages. Then came the word of the resolution, and on February 1, when the report was returned to Congress, four horses and five carriages had been disposed of. In the figures given the cost of the harnesses had not been taken into account. In some instances they are quite expensive, running as high as $300 or more, and swelling the sum total by several thousand dollars.

But it isn't just coachmen and drivers alone that serve the high officials privately and receive their pay at the public crib. According to an old employee in one of the Departments, it is a common thing for Cabinet officers to take men who are maintained on the Government pay rolls to serve in their homes as butlers during public receptions. One man in particular, who is employed as a messenger, it was said, has served repeatedly in the capacity of butler for a certain Cabinet officer.

FRENCH NOVELS, CUSTOMS PORTS, AND OTHER LEAKS.

In a line with the apparently universal policy at Washington of getting the Government to pay for everything, the luxuriant literary tastes of the Department clerks, which have developed a penchant for French novels, has resulted in a surprisingly choice collection of that class of reading in the libraries devoted to their exclusive use, and for the maintenance of which appropriation bills are turned into Congress regularly each session.

The capital has probably some of the finest libraries in the world. But the Congressional Library, with its thousands of volumes; the great Public Library of the District of Columbia, the magnificent scientific library of the Smithsonian Institution, and the half dozen others, all of which are available, seemingly are not enough. Each Department of the Government has its own private library. Recently the suspicion has been growing that the technical books these private libraries were supposed to be devoted to exclusively were being supplemented by racy novels—French and otherwise. An investigation of this suspicion led to a proposition by Chairman HEMENWAY, of the House Committee on Appropriations, that in the future all purchases be limited to the exact needs of the libraries in question.

The War Department has the largest of the exclusive libraries. It contains 50,000 volumes and is estimated to be worth $75,000. When the edict by Mr. HEMENWAY went forth, the order came quickly from the head of the Department to take the works of fiction from the shelves, and within the last few days the librarian, James W. Cheney, has sent away 900 novels. The same thing has been done in the other departmental libraries. Altogether there are something like fifteen of these departmental libraries, which are probably worth in the neighborhood of $300,000. It has been estimated that the total number of novels contained in them would reach 7,000 or 8,000, to say nothing of thousands of books that are not on technical lines and have no place in such libraries, which are simply supposed to be working adjuncts to the Departments.

Mention has been made of custom ports whose expenses exceed their receipts by many hundreds of dollars. The list is as follows:

One of the biggest leaks is in the salaries of the clerks and other employees of the House and Senate. If one should go to the head doorkeeper of either legislative branch and ask him how many men he had in his employ, the answer would be evasive. As a matter of fact, it would be a difficult thing for anyone to obtain definite information on that subject. If you look through the appropriations you will find a jumble of oddly constructed sentences indicating that special and assistant messengers and clerks and doorkeepers had been employed, and always winding up for the demand for extra money. For instance, in the last appropriation bill we find a jumble of sentences indicating that many men have been employed, for which $97,450 is demanded. Then we see that the under superintendent of the Capitol building and his men want $61,776. After that comes a request for $92,684 for clerks and messengers to committees. Then there is a demand for $16,146 for more clerks, and then the Sergeant-at-Arms and his assistants want $18,810, and right along in the same breath come the Doorkeeper and his assistants with a request for $161,042, followed by more special messengers and extra clerks until the total salaries of the House are swelled to $515,204; and just as one is drawing a sigh of relief he sees the item $458,800 for clerk hire for Members and Delegates, which amount they certify they have paid or agree to pay for necessary work, which is allowed under the resolution approved March 3, 1893. This raises the total to $1,074,004.

In the Senate it is about the same, in proportion to the number, for the total amount or salaries is $532,443. It has been estimated that both House and Senate could get along as well with one-half the number of employees as they now have. The messengers and clerks are literally running over one another. In view of this state of affairs, it is said that a saving of at least $500,000 a year could be made in the two branches of the Government. According to a good authority, fully 15 per cent of the present force of clerks are inefficient, causing a sheer loss to the Government in this respect of $130,000 annually.

Despite the fact, however, that the clerks have barely enough to do to keep them awake during the sessions, which seldom last more than four or five hours, bills are usually passed toward the close of Congress allowing them extra pay for "extra" work done during the regular hours of business. In addition to this, we find that in the appropriation bill of 1903 salaries in all departments were raised to the extent of $204,952.

In the appropriations for the Printing Office there are chances for many leaks. Last year the general appropriation for printing was $6,485,137, but this did not include it all. Within the last few years some most remarkable books have been turned out by the Public Printer. Originally intended to print public documents, the shop has gradually been turned into a general publishing concern. There has been a great demand by the gifted authors who have contributed regularly to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and such books as the Agricultural Department and the Weather Bureau issue to see their productions illustrated. This grew to be a craze, until at the last Congress official directories were printed with half-tone photographs of Senators and Representatives neatly inserted at the proper pages. But this was too much for even a billion and a half dollar Congress, and the entire edition was ordered in, and the edict issued that in the future Congressional directories would be printed unembellished.

But back of all the efforts to get money out of the Government are the contingent bills. They include in gross lumps all the expenses that accrue during a session of Congress and offer a wide field for "bunching" bills that could not get through under ordinary circumstances. Last year the contingent bills footed up to more than $3,000,000. A fair example of the way in which they are put in may be shown in the contingent expenses of the land offices. One of them reads:

"For clerk hire, rent, and other incidental expenses of the district land offices, $200,000." No other explanation is deemed necessary. Some of the other big contingent bills were: From the Treasury Department, $164,000; foreign missions, $202,000; Marine Corps, $160,000; Senate, $206,800; House, $189,275; Post-Office, $147,000, and consular service, $346,977.

When the Departments have gone the limit even with an indulgent Congress, they turn to their old friend, the contingent bill.

MILLIONS SIFTED THROUGH ARMY AND NAVY BILLS.

"Millions of dollars go into our Army and Navy every year," said Representative GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK, of Nebraska. "There are chances for great leaks in the appropriation bills for both. We have about 59,000 men in our Army, and this year the appropriation for it is $77,000,000. The appropriation for the German army is less than $150,000,000 with 600,000 men—ten times the number that we have and only twice the appropriation. The appropriation for the French army is less than $150,000,000 and numbers 561,000 men.

"The big item, I find, is transportation. Here is a big leak. The appropriation bill for 1903 shows that it amounted to $15,500,000. More than one-third of this goes to the railroads, which clearly indicates why all the railroad officials favor great armies. The estimates for the Army for 1905 are $77,000,000, practically the same that they were for this year, but the navy appropriation has been increased from $82,000,000 to $102,000,000. Out of $23,000,000 for construction and machinery and $13,000,000 for armor and armament, the steel trust will get the lion's share. A cut of $23,000,000 has been made in battle ships, which will have to go on the bill next year.

"The expense of running the United States Government for 1904 will be $775,000,000, while the expenses of Great Britain, which is paying war debts, are $920,000,000; Germany, $500,000,000, and France, $719,000,000. In this connection it must be considered that the other nations are burdened with heavy interest on their debts. England pays an interest of $115,000,000 and France $300,000,000, while the United States has an interest of less than $28,000,000. But there seems to be a desire to increase expenses on every side. The Naval Board asked the House Committee on Naval Affairs for a naval station in the Philippines to cost $32,000,000, but Admiral Dewey opposed the plan and said what was needed there was docks. That is only an instance of what they are all doing. The expenses of conducting the business of the country have doubled since Cleveland's Administration. Then it was costing us $1,000,000 a day. Now it is costing us $2,000,000 a day. And this is in a time of absolute peace. This vast revenue taken from the people should be regarded as a trust fund, and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations owes it to the people to see that all these ridiculous fads and foibles, these experiments and wastes of public money, are stopped."

Representative JAMES M. ROBINSON, of Indiana, in speaking on the expenses of the Government, said:

"Mr. HEMENWAY, chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations, sounded the note of discontent when he warned his Republican colleagues the other day that there must be retrenchment and reform, and that a deficiency of $42,000,000 this year is upon us. Farsighted Republican Members of Congress have for years foreseen this menace, but have been too few in number to stay it.

"A new expenditure must be reckoned with in this Congress. A vast amount of money will be needed for ferreting out and prosecuting the post-office grafters and in covering a vastly greater number of cases against malefactors in localities not yet investigated. But the post-office cases will be dwarfed in comparison with the land thefts. When judge, ex-judge, official, and ex-official in every station connected with the service are charged by the Secretary of the Interior with wholesale violations of law, and the work not yet begun, the enormity of the situation and the expense is made apparent. Then come the Indian-land frauds and the frauds in the Indian Territory, and more money must be furnished to send the guilty ones to prison. Canal and waterway improvements of merit must stop till we check up the books and see whether the deficit is to be $42,000,000 or more."

"It is simply an age of riotous extravagance," said Henry L. West, Commissioner of the District of Columbia, who is a close student of the nation's finances. "In Jackson's time there was a fight for the spoils of office, but to-day the entire patronage of that period would not amount to the patronage in the State of New York alone. The President has taken $80,000,000 in personal patronage out of the Treasury. In every Department there is evidence of the grossest laxity. It takes more men in the auditing department of the money-order division of the Post-Office than it does to run the New York Central, the Pennsylvania, the Erie, and the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy railroads combined. In all Departments there is an army of inefficient clerks, but they are never discharged. There are 2,300 clerks in the Pension Office, and the ages of some of them vary from 65 to 95 years, yet not a man is dropped. When Congress adjourns, every clerk in the Capitol building will leave and his work will stop till next session, but his salary will go on just the same. And every year we pass resolutions to give extra salaries to these clerks, when they don't earn those they have already received. Congressmen are allowed $1,200 a year for a secretary. The money is not paid on separate vouchers, but is given directly to the Congressmen. Many appoint their wives or sons or daughters to the position and are that much ahead.

"It has cost $750,000 to remodel the White House. In 1904 the amount asked for the rural free delivery was $12,500,000, and for 1905 it is $15,000,000. The system in the last few years has grown to alarming proportions. It was all right when it started, but now every little bunch of four or five farmers living within a radius of ten miles of one another have their postman. Congressmen have found out that it helps them in their campaigns to get through a rural free delivery for every farmer in their districts. The appropriation began with $100,000 and now it is $15,000,000. But, you see, the advantage of it comes in right here: Every one of those rural mail carriers is a Republican and carries Republican literature to the farmers and makes them Republican speeches."

In the meantime the Committee on Appropriations is striving to keep down the bills and prevent the deficit from reaching beyond the $42,000,000 limit.

FREDERICK BOYD STEVENSON.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have leave to insert some statements in the RECORD entirely disconnected from my speech.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOUTELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the post-office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MEMORIAL OF MISSISSIPPI CHOCTAW INDIANS.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a House document a memorial from the Mississippi Choctaw Indians, praying for an extension of time within which their right to remove to the Choctaw country may be permitted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to have printed as a House document a memorial from the Choctaw Indians.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, as this is a document that comes from an Indian tribe, I will not object to it; otherwise I should.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The following is the document referred to:

Memorial of Mississippi Choctaws, praying for an extension of time within which their right to remove to the Choctaw country may be permitted and the passage of bill H. R. 13560.

The honorable the Senate and House of Representatives:

Your memorialists, full-blood Mississippi Choctaws, residents of Mississippi and of Indian Territory, most humbly pray that those who shall have been identified by the United States Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes may be permitted at any time prior to the completion of allotments to file their applications to said Commission for allotments, and that they be not required to conform to any other rules relative to their enrollment or allotment than other citizens of the Choctaw Nation by blood.

Your memorialists respectfully submit that by the act of Congress approved July 1, 1902, entitled "An act to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes of Indians, and for other purposes," it was provided by article 41 that Mississippi Choctaws should, within six months after the date of their identification as Mississippi Choctaws by the said Commission, make bona fide settlement within the Choctaw-Chickasaw country, and furnish proof of such settlement within one year after the date of their said identification as Mississippi Choctaws, under penalty of being barred from their rights as Choctaws.

Many of your petitioners do not understand the English language.

At the request of the Choctaw Nation, through its delegate, Congress has heretofore provided that no contracts made by Mississippi Choctaw srelative to the lands to be allotted them in the Choctaw-Chickasaw Nation should be valid. This cuts off from the Mississippi Choctaws the opportunity of employing attorneys willing to incur the expense of attending to the various requirements imposed by the statutes.

These requirements were inserted in the act of Congress upon the insistence of the delegates and attorneys of the Choctaw-Chickasaw Nation with a view to depriving your petitioners of their rights, knowing that your petitioners were very misinformed, and entirely without means, and that many of them did not understand the English language.

Your memorialists are further required, after having resided upon the lands of the Choctaw-Chickasaw Nation for a period of three years and before the expiration of four years, to furnish proof of the fact of the three years' residence as a further condition of enjoying the right of Choctaw citizenship. Your memorialists humbly pray for an amendment of the present law, as follows, to wit:

"Mississippi Choctaws, identified by the United States Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes as full-blood Choctaws, shall have the right at any time, prior to the closing of the allotment office of the Choctaw-Chickasaw country, to make application and have allotted to them and to their children born of them prior to the closing of the Choctaw rolls lands the same as other Choctaws by blood, without being required to comply with any other conditions than imposed upon other Choctaws, and any conditions making a distinction against the said Mississippi Choctaws are hereby repealed."

Your memorialists respectfully submit that ingenious conditions have been inserted in the law at the request of the attorneys of the Choctaw-Chickasaw Nation, by virtue of which many Mississippi Choctaws would be barred. Said attorneys have a contract with the Choctaw Nation by which said attorneys receive a fee from the Choctaw Nation for each applicant for citizenship defeated by said attorneys, as your memorialists are informed and believe; for example, your memorialists were required within six months after the date of identification to make bona fide settlement within the Choctaw-Chickasaw country, when it was well known that your memorialists were exceedingly poor; when it was well known that your memorialists, under the Mississippi statutes, could not leave their landlords during the crop season; when under that statute it was a misdemeanor for anyone to invite a Mississippi Choctaw to leave his landlord, when under contract with or in debt to his landlord; that such removal could only be accomplished by a compromise with the landlord and the payment of the indebtedness of the Mississippi Choctaw before he could be allowed to remove; when by the skillful contrivance of the attorneys of the Choctaw Nation the Mississippi Choctaws were cut off from financial support, by being refused the right to contract with regard to the right of their prospective inheritance in the Choctaw country; that under these artful conditions many of your memorialists were prevented within the six months from making bona fide settlement in the Choctaw country; that these attorneys, having a pecuniary interest as aforesaid, have invoked the courts against your memorialists, as will appear by Exhibit "A."

The attorneys for the Choctaw Nation have further ingeniously contrived and invented various other pitfalls for the Mississippi Choctaws who by incompetency or ignorance or poverty may neglect to make due proof of three years' bona fide residence and prior to the termination of a fixed four-year term.

Your memorialists respectfully insist that these conditions are imposed for the artful purpose of making fees for the attorneys of the Choctaw Nation, to the great harm of your memorialists and without serving any good cause either to the Choctaw Nation or to the United States.

Your memorialists have heretofore set up their rights in the premises to the Congress of the United States by various petitions, as will appear from the following:

Memorials of December, 1896, and January, 1897, and September, 1897.
House Report No. 3080, Fifty-fourth Congress, second session.
House bill No. 10372.
Senate Document No. 129, Fifty-fourth Congress, second session.
House Document No. 274, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session.
Public 162, approved June 28, 1898, Curtis Act.
Emma Nabors v. Choctaw Nation, Supreme Court United States, October term, 1898, brief of appellants.
House Document No. 426, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session.
Senate Document No. 263, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session.
Indian appropriation act approved May 31, 1900. By this act (Public 131, p. 18) it was provided as follows:

"Provided, That any Mississippi Choctaw, duly identified as such by the United States Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, shall have the right, at any time prior to the approval of the final rolls of the Choctaws and Chickasaws by the Secretary of the Interior, to make settlement within the Choctaw-Chickasaw country, and on proof of the fact of bona fide settlement may be enrolled by the said United States Commission and by the Secretary of the Interior as Choctaws entitled to allotments: Provided further, That all contracts or agreements looking to the sale or incumbrance in any way of the land to be allotted to said Mississippi Choctaws shall be null and void."

These particulars we pray shall be reenacted as above prayed for. Your memorialists call attention to the fact that this language prevented us from receiving proper and necessary pecuniary assistance, and the provisions of the Curtis Act, Public 162, section 19, page 8, prohibits us pledging any money which might ultimately be due us per capita, the law saying: "The same shall not be liable to the payment of any previously contracted obligations."

Your memorialists were thus cut off from pecuniary assistance when it was well known to the Choctaws that we were too poor to remove ourselves, as they themselves so memorialized Congress of the United States, and made that representation through the Choctaw general council, declaring that we were too poor to emigrate ourselves into the Choctaw Nation. (P. 3, H. R. Rept. No. 2080, 54th Cong., 2d sess.)

Your memorialists call attention to the various endeavors to deny them the right conceded to them by Congress. The rights of your memorialists are further set up in House Report No. 2522, Fifty-sixth Congress, second session; House Document No. 490, Fifty-sixth Congress, second session, and Senate Document No. 319, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, and by the Choctaw-Chickasaw agreement (Public, 228), approved July 1, 1902, in sections 41, 42, 43, and 44.

Your memorialists humbly submit that putting the Mississippi Choctaws, who have been identified, upon the same basis as other Choctaws will serve an important part in disentangling a portion of the complicated conditions brought about in allotting the lands of Indian Territory, and will serve to prevent delay in final allotment.

THE MISSISSIPPI CHOCTAWS,
By CHARLES F. WINTON.
R. L. OWEN, Counsel.

To Tams Bixby, Thomas B. Needles, Clifton R. Breckinridge, and W. E. Stanley, as the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes:

You are hereby notified that the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations or tribes of Indians will, on the 18th day of January, 1904, at 2 o'clock p. m., or at such time as may be fixed by the court, apply to the Hon. Charles W. Raymond, judge of the United States court for the western district of the Indian Territory, to grant a temporary restraining order against you, as the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, as prayed for in the bill in equity, a copy of which is hereto attached and marked "Exhibit A."

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW NATIONS OR TRIBES OF INDIANS, By MANSFIELD, MCMURRAY & CORNISH, Attorneys.

In the United States court for the western district of the Indian Territory, sitting at Muscogee. The Choctaw and Chickasaw nations or tribes of Indians, plaintiffs, v. Tams Bixby, Thomas B. Needles, Clifton R. Breckinridge, and W. E. Stanley, as the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, defendants. Bill in equity.

The plaintiffs, the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations or tribes of Indians, for cause of action against the defendants, state:

That under the laws of the United States and the treaties between said nations and the United States they are the owners of all the lands embraced within the area known as the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations; that the individual members of said tribes own said lands in fee simple, the character of their holding being fixed by the following provision of article 1 of the treaty of 1855, between the United States and the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations or tribes of Indians:

"And pursuant to an act of Congress approved May 28, 1830, the United States do hereby secure and guarantee the lands embraced within the said limits, to the members of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes, their heirs and successors, to be held in common; so that each and every member of either tribe shall have an equal undivided interest in the whole: Provided, No part thereof shall ever be sold without the consent of both tribes; and that said lands shall revert to the United States if said Indians and their heirs become extinct or abandon the same."

That under the provisions of the treaty entered into between the United States and said nation or tribes of Indians, on April 23, 1898, commonly known as the Atoka agreement, and the agreement supplementary thereto, entered into on the 21st day of March, 1902, and approved by act of Congress of July 1, 1902, the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes is authorized and empowered, in strict conformity with said treaties, to allot said lands in severalty among the members of said tribes, as therein provided.

That among other things said supplementary treaty contains the following provision in regard to Mississippi Choctaws:

"SEC. 41. All persons duly identified by the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, under the provisions of section 21 of the act of Congress approved June 28, 1898 (30 Stats., 495), as Mississippi Choctaws entitled to benefits under article 14 of the treaty between the United States and the Choctaw Nation concluded September 27, 1830, may, at any time within six months after the date of their identification as Mississippi Choctaws by the said Commission, make bona fide settlement in the Choctaw-Chickasaw country, and upon proof of such settlement to such Commission within one year after the date of their said identification as Mississippi Choctaws shall be enrolled by such Commission as Mississippi Choctaws entitled to allotment as herein provided for citizens of the tribes, subject to the special provisions herein provided as to Mississippi Choctaws, and said enrollment shall be final when approved by the Secretary of the Interior. The application of no person for identification as a Mississippi Choctaw shall be received by said Commission after six months subsequent to the date of the final ratification of this agreement, and in the disposition of such applications all full-blood Mississippi Choctaw Indians and the descendants of any Mississippi Choctaw Indians, whether of full or mixed blood, who received a patent to land under the said fourteenth article of the said treaty of 1830, who had not moved to and made bona fide settlement in the Choctaw-Chickasaw country prior to June 28, 1898, shall be deemed to be Mississippi Choctaws entitled to benefits under article 14 of the said treaty of September 27, 1830, and to identification as such by said Commission, but this direction or provision shall be deemed to be only a rule of evidence and shall not be invoked by or operate to the advantage of any applicant who is not a Mississippi Choctaw of the full blood or who is not the descendant of a Mississippi Choctaw who received a patent to land under said treaty, or who is otherwise barred from the right of citizenship in the Choctaw Nation. All of said Mississippi Choctaws so enrolled by said Commission shall be upon a separate roll.

"SEC. 42. When any such Mississippi Choctaw shall have, in good faith, continuously resided upon the lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations for a period of three years, including his residence thereon before and after such enrollment, he shall, upon due proof of such continuous, bona fide residence, made in such manner and before such officer as may be designated by the Secretary of the Interior, receive a patent for his allotment, as provided in the Atoka agreement, and he shall hold the lands allotted to him, as provided in this agreement for citizens of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations.

"SEC. 43. Applications for enrollment as Mississippi Choctaws, and applications to have land set apart to them as such, must be made personally before the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes. Fathers may apply for their minor children, and if the father be dead, the mother may apply. Husbands may apply for wives. Applications for orphans, insane persons, and persons of unsound minds may be made by duly appointed guardians or curator, and for aged and infirm persons and prisoners by agents duly authorized thereunto by power of attorney, in the discretion of said Commission.

"SEC. 44. If within four years after such enrollment any such Mississippi Choctaw, or his heirs or representatives, if he be dead, fails to make proof of such continuous bona fide residence for the period so prescribed, or up to the time of the death of such Mississippi Choctaw, in case of his death after enrollment, he and his heirs and representatives, if he be dead, shall be deemed to have acquired no interest in the lands set apart to him, and the same shall be sold at public auction for case, under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and the proceeds paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes, and distributed per capita with other funds of the tribes. Such lands shall not be sold for less than their appraised value. Upon payment of the full purchase price patent shall issue to the purchaser."

That the defendants, as the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, have no power and authority to receive proof of the settlement of any person identified as a Mississippi Choctaw, entitled to allotment as provided in said treaty, after the expiration of six months from the identification of said person as a Mississippi Choctaw, entitled to benefits under the provisions of said supplementary agreement; nor has the Commissioner any power, after proof of such settlement, to enroll such person and allot to him a share of the lands of said tribes, as provided in said agreement.

The plaintiffs further state that on the 14th day of February, 1903, the defendants, as the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, identified under the provisions of said agreement all the persons so applying for identification as Mississippi Choctaws in the case of King Brandy et al., pending before said Commission, viz, King Brandy, Joe Baptieste, William Cole, Mary Baptieste and her two minor children, Sam and Louisa Baptieste, and Celestine Brandy.

That the six months within which said persons so identified as Mississippi Choctaws could, under the provisions of said treaty, make bona fide settlement within the Choctaw and Chickasaw country expired on the 14th day of August, 1903, and that up to and including that date none of said persons removed to and made bona fide settlement within the Choctaw-Chickasaw country.

That notwithstanding this failure to comply with the law, and notwithstanding said defendants, as the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, have no lawful power and authority to do so, the defendants are threatening and will, unless restrained, permit said persons to remove to and make settlement in the Choctaw-Chickasaw country and take possession of the lands belonging to these plaintiffs to the exclusion of bona fide members of said tribes, and are threatening and unless restrained will permit said parties to make proof of such settlement to said Commission and will, unless restrained, enroll said persons as Mississippi Choctaws and make to them an allotment of lands as provided in said supplementary agreement.

That the plaintiffs, the members of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nation, will thus be deprived of their common property of the approximate value of $40,000 to the great damage of these plaintiffs and in violation of their legal and treaty rights.

Plaintiffs further state that said threatened action by the defendants is unlawful, to the great damage of plaintiffs, and constitutes an injury to them for which they have no adequate legal remedy.

Wherefore, the premises considered, the plaintiffs pray that the defendants be enjoined from taking such threatened action, and that upon final hearing that a decree be entered perpetually enjoining them from taking such action in regard to all of such persons or in regard to any persons similarly situated.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 16, 1904.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD EVERETT HALE.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on the request of Mr. FAIRBANKS, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS OF GARLAND COUNTY, ARK.

Mr. BERRY. Yesterday the bill (H. R. 1956) to authorize an exchange of sites for the public buildings of Garland County, Ark., was received from the House of Representatives and referred by the presiding officer to the Committee on Public Lands, but by a mistake in the Journal it is shown that it was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The bill belongs to the Committee on Public Lands. It has no reference whatever to any Government building, and the Chair referred it properly, but by mistake it was sent to another committee. Some of the officers of the Senate have suggested to me that the better and more convenient way would be simply to move to discharge the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be discharged from the further consideration of House bill 1956, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. The Chair hears no objection, and that order is made.

REPORT ON REINDEER IN ALASKA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 12th instant, a letter from the Commissioner of Education forwarding the report of Dr. Sheldon Jackson upon "The introduction of domestic reindeer into Alaska;" which, on motion of Mr. NELSON, was, with the accompanying report, together with the maps and illustrations, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

MARGARET V. MADDUX.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings of fact filed by the court in the cause of Margaret V. Maddux v. The United States; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 11126) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to add to the segregation of coal and asphalt lands in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, Indian Territory; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. FAIRBANKS, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by himself on February 10, proposing to appropriate $500,000 for the acquisition of square No. 324 in the city of Washington, D. C., as a site for an addition to the post-office building, intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, submitted a favorable report thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

INDEFINITE POSTPONEMENT OF DUPLICATE CLAIMS BILLS.

Mr. WARREN. I am directed by the Committee on Claims to report back thirty-nine claims bills. They are duplicates, identical with other bills providing for the same claims, and I ask that they may be laid on the table. In the ordinary way they would perhaps be best disposed of by an indefinite postponement, but I am informed by the Secretary of the Senate, who has charge of such matters, that if the bills are indefinitely postponed the papers can not be returned to the claimants except by an order of the Senate. We find that in the case of some of the bills the papers, proofs, etc., are all with one bill, and in other cases the papers are divided and a part with one bill and a part with another bill bearing on the same subject. If we indefinitely postpone a bill, the papers attached to it are of course locked up until the case is opened with new evidence or a special order is had; and it was suggested by the Secretary that I might move to lay the bills on the table, leaving the papers of evidence, etc., free. However, I am not insistent upon that course. Whatever is the orderly way to dispose of the bills will be satisfactory to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the committee find as a matter of fact that the bills ought not to be passed?

Mr. WARREN. They are duplicates of bills that are under consideration by the committee, some of which may be reported favorably and others adversely, but to clear the docket and to get matters in a more concrete form we desire to dispose of these duplicates.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator if the papers should not be retained with the bills that are now before the committee?

Mr. WARREN. Some of them are, and papers are coming in from day to day. Affidavits are often filed after the bills come in to the committee. But certain papers are with the bills now on the table; and if the bills are indefinitely postponed, it requires an order of the Senate to return the papers so that they may be filed with other bills relating to the same claims.

Mr. HOAR. If the bills lie on the table, they will have to be reprinted with a history or account of the bills on our Calendar every day from now to the end of the session, which would seem to be lumbering up the Calendar unnecessarily with thirty-nine bills. I merely make a suggestion to the Senator; I do not wish to interfere with his disposition of the bill; but it strikes me that probably in the cases where the bills are accompanied with papers, the papers should be retained and the bills indefinitely postponed.

Mr. WARREN. In view of what the Senator has said, and if it be in order, I will move that the papers submitted with the duplicate bills may be returned to the Secretary's office, to in turn be transmitted to the committee for consideration with the retained bills to which they may refer, and that the bills themselves, which are now under consideration, may be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest to the Senator to withdraw the papers.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the post-office appropriation bill; and pending that, I wish to state that I assume that the division of time will be as has heretofore been arranged, to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] and myself; but for the purpose of making it clear to the House, I suggest that three hours yet remain for the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] and two hours for myself.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that will be the arrangement.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I do not know but the best place to bury that bill would be in the RECORD. I do not think I will object.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I now yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SPIGHT].

Mr. SPIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak a little while upon a subject which is attracting attention all over the country, not in a spirit of retaliation, nor for the purpose of indulging in harsh criticism, but to show by comparison the injustice sometimes done one section of the country and incidentally to vindicate the people of that section against the general charge of brutality and barbarism, and at the same time to show that those people have clearer conceptions of the remedy for existing evils in their own communities than have those who are more remote.

What is called the "negro problem" has become a question of national interest and demands attention wherever, North and South, the negro appears in any considerable numbers. Practically all of the Southern States, in which the negro forms such a percentage of the population as to make him a political factor to be reckoned with, have by constitutional provision deprived him of his power for harm in the administration of our domestic affairs, and we have done it because it was absolutely necessary to protect our people from financial ruin and to preserve our civilization. For a time we were compelled to employ methods that were extremely distasteful and very demoralizing, but now we are accomplishing the same and even better results by strictly constitutional and legal procedure.

For more than ten years the negroes in Mississippi have understood that they were not to be allowed to participate in State or county governments, and as a result we have had but little trouble with them, and they have been better satisfied and more prosperous than at any time since their emancipation. We recognize that the negro is a producer of wealth, especially in our cotton fields, and this fact, coupled with the naturally kind feeling entertained for him by the white people with whom he has lived all his life, gives him an opportunity for honest, productive labor not enjoyed by his race anywhere else. We deny him the right to vote, under certain conditions, and to hold office, but have never denied him the right to work for an honest living, as has been repeatedly done in some of the Northern States. We sometimes kill them for outrageous crimes, but never because they want to work. [Applause.]

This brings to mind the subject of lynching, which has called down upon the South unmerited abuse and vituperation at the hands of the northern press and people.

I frankly confess, and am sorry that I have to do it, that unnecessary lynchings have sometimes occurred in the South. So far as I am concerned, I am opposed to mob violence as a general proposition. I do not think that lynchings for any other crime than the nameless one against womanhood ought ever to occur. In all others the courts of the country are ample and generally, with us, swift to punish. But in the one class of crimes so brutal and destructive of all that is dear to an enlightened people no one with a spark of manhood in him can doubt that instant death to the perpetrator should follow upon the ascertainment of the guilty facts. The poor, suffering woman who has been the victim of the devilish lust of a brute, white or black, should not be compelled to appear in court and repeat before a jury the horrible details of the outrage, but personally I am opposed to burning or needless torture, because of the brutalizing tendencies. This sentiment in favor of immediate punishment by death to the criminal is not confined to any section or any State, but will occur in any community and has repeatedly occurred in northern as well as in southern communities.

Nor is the burning at the stake of such brutes confined to the South, but it has occurred in a number of Northern States, and only last summer, in the city of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware, for the outrage and murder of a pure young woman, the negro who committed the double crime was taken from the jail by a mob of the "better class of citizens" and hanged and his body burned, and a Presbyterian minister of the gospel on the following Sunday, from the pulpit of a crowded church, openly and vigorously justified it. If this had occurred in Mississippi or any other Southern State, the pharisaical pretended negro lovers of the northern press would have held up their hands in holy horror and under flaming headlines would have been loud in their denunciation of "another southern outrage" and evidence of "barbarism in that Godless section." But for once many of them forgot their cowardly denunciations of a long-suffering people and became, for the time being, men with red blood in their veins, and spoke like men in the presence of an awful crime swiftly and horribly avenged.

The Philadelphia Public Ledger, published within 30 miles of the scene of the tragedy, said the next day:

> The wretch who died at the stake yesterday morning on the spot where his hateful crime had been committed deserved no more merciful an end. The cruel, pitiable, unspeakably grievous wrong of his victim cried out for retribution like this. In the fact that it came—let there be no hypocritical pretense otherwise—most of us can not repress an instinctive thrill of satisfaction.

No southern paper nor any southern man could have expressed it more forcibly.

The Philadelphia Press, a leading Republican paper, the property of ex-Postmater-General Smith, says:

> When we consider the offense of the negro, cruel as was his punishment, there will be no sympathy wasted on him. The human brute who sacrifices to his lust the life of an innocent young woman puts himself out of the pale of pity, no matter how horrible the punishment that follows in the wake of the crime.

The Minneapolis Times says:

Parallels of latitude seem to have naught to do with this species of lawlessness nowadays. Given a negro guilty of the horrible crime for which so many have suffered death, North and South, men are not disposed to await the deliberate processes of the law, but rush to the jail in frenzy and wreak ghastly vengeance upon the accused.

And this from the Buffalo Courier:

The truth may as well be recognized that there is not a section in the United States inhabited by white people where hands would voluntarily be kept off the perpetrator of such an unspeakably fiendish deed as the Delaware negro committed.

But it will be remembered that this mob did not stop at the burning of the criminal, but attacked the negro settlement in the city, and other negroes and white men were killed and wounded. This never occurs in the South. When the guilty wretch has paid the penalty of his awful crime, that is an end of it, and the mob is satisfied and does not wreak indiscriminate vengeance upon the innocent because they belong to the same race as the criminal. Much has been said of race prejudice in the South.

We have enough of this prejudice, if you wish to call it so, to forever debar the negro from active participation in our State governments, to exclude him from our dining rooms except as a waiter, and to shut the door tight and fast to any approach to social equality; and while we occasionally burn a black devil that has committed a fiendish crime, unlike our northern brethren, we don't go out in open defiance of law, with a torch in one hand and a gun in the other, burning the houses over the heads of defenseless women and children and shooting the poor scared inmates as they flee for their lives. This occurred in the great city of New York in the summer of 1900, after a negro had killed a policeman, and it was said at the time that the mob was led by officers in uniform. During the same year, in Illinois, a mob of white men, with guns and, I believe, cannon, drove off a lot of negroes who had been carried there from the South to work inth e mines. No charge against them except that they wanted to work.

In the little city of Danville, Ill., the home of the distinguished Speaker of this House, one negro was lynched last year, if I remember correctly, because he made some objection to efforts of the mob to take another negro from the jail, who was charged with the crime the penalty for which is usually death by hanging or at the stake. The mob failed to get the negro from the jail, but so determined was the effort that several white men were killed or wounded before the attempt was abandoned. It is true that by a bloody sacrifice the life of the guilty negro was saved; but this does not controvert my argument that the men of Illinois are like the men of Mississippi under similar conditions, and that in the presence of a specially brutal crime the same spirit of vengeance will assert itself.

Indiana, the home of Mr. CRUMPACKER, who has displayed so much zeal in his efforts to punish Southern States because unwilling to acknowledge the political equality of the negro with the white man, has also a record for lynching and burning. And only last week in the city of Springfield, in the State of Ohio, which State is the home of one of the most distinguished advocates of what he is pleased to call "manhood suffrage" upon this floor, a negro murderer was lynched by an undisguised mob, and it is said that they went "wild with delight" while they poured a shower of bullets into the body of the dead negro as it hung dangling from a telegraph pole in a public place in this city of 40,000 people. But this didn't satisfy the jolly fellows. But at night they came together again and set fire to the houses in the negro settlement in the city and, cold as it was, drove the frightened men, women, and children to the near-by woods to save their lives. Springfield is said to be the home of a cultured, refined, and Christian people, with fifty churches, more than twenty schools and colleges, and not more than 50 miles from the State capital.

Just at this point, let me, by contrast, show what was done only a few days ago by the governor of Mississippi, who was denounced all over the North last fall because during his campaign for election he declared that education had done no good to the negro. After the lynching of the negro at Springfield and after a large part of the negro settlement had been burned the governor of Ohio ordered several companies of militia to go to the scene and stop further destruction of property. In Mississippi, when it reached the ears of Governor Vardaman that a negro murderer was in danger of being lynched in a town 150 miles from the capital, the courageous chief executive, instead of ordering the military to repair to the scene of danger, put himself at the head of the soldiers, chartered a special train, and with lightning speed went to the help of the brave sheriff of the county, rescued the imperiled negro, and removed him to a place of safety; and in a day or two afterwards this same conscientious governor saved another negro from a mob.

Both of these cases were murders of peculiar atrocity, and yet this chief executive of a much-maligned State, who had been so roundly denounced as unfriendly to the negro, was too courageous and conscientious to suffer the law to be violated when in human power to prevent it. The New York Times, commenting on the Ohio lawlessness and comparing the action of the officials with that of Governor Vardaman, to which I have referred, says:

The brutal and cowardly murder of a negro prisoner in Springfield, Ohio, permitted by a pusillanimous sheriff and an inefficient or faithless police force, might well be compared with the recent treatment of a like crime threatened in Mississippi to the sore discredit of the northern community.

This paper says, further, what everybody knows is true, that "the prisoner would not have been slaughtered as he was had he not been a negro." Here are two other extracts:

The State of Ohio appears to need a Vardaman to protect captives of the authorities from mob murder. The lynching of the negro Dixon at Springfield last Monday seems to have been a case of mob vengeance on a man whose color even more than his crime made him obnoxious to the rabble who clubbed and shot him to death, and then dragged his body in savage triumph through the streets. Does anybody suppose that such ruffians are shocked at the crime of manslaughter—unless it chances to be a negro who commits it? (Milwaukee Sentinel.)

Mississippi, with its dense black population and a governor who ran for office on a platform opposing common-school education for the negroes, has put Ohio to shame in the latest lynching episodes reported from the two States. The executive of the southern State has just shown praiseworthy courage, promptness, and determination in foiling two successive attempts to lynch colored prisoners. The authorities of the great Commonwealth of Ohio, with its wealth, its schools, and its overwhelming majority of white citizens, seemingly took no steps whatever to save from mob vengeance the negro who was lynched yesterday by a mob at Springfield.

In this instance it should be noted the prisoner was not charged with "the usual crime" of attacking white women. (Philadelphia Bulletin.)

This comparison of cases shows another thing that ought to put to shame every man who prates hypocritically about race prejudice in the South. Such scenes as I have described of the killing of negroes because they want to work, burning their houses and driving them out into the bitter cold of midwinter simply because they are negroes, have never occurred in the South. Such race prejudice finds no place in southern hearts. With us every deserving, law-abiding negro is encouraged to work, and they are found not only on the farms, but in the shops in every village, town, and city, and they know that the white men are their friends even though they are not allowed to vote or hold office, and they are happier for it. It is only the idle and the vicious that fall under the white man's displeasure, while the industrious and worthy are as safe from harm as their white neighbors.

I have noticed that not only is the prejudice against the negro much stronger in the North than in the South, but I have noticed also that northern communities are beginning to have a wholesome dread of too great an influx of negro population and the consequent danger of his political power for evil. Not long ago the Philadelphia Record, in speaking of the danger of the increase of negro voters in Pennsylvania, said:

The move in Maryland to disfranchise negroes, following upon disfranchisement in Virginia, is not without peril to the people of Pennsylvania, if as a result of it there shall be a further African invasion of this State. Our heavy negro vote is already a political misfortune, contributing potentially toward the continuance of misgovernment. It is also an undeniable fact that the safety of life and property has been put at greater hazard in the southern and eastern counties of Pennsylvania by the drift northward of an undesirable negro element. It is quite possible that in the near future the people of this State may be obliged to take measures to protect themselves against further African intrusion.

This is a wise view to take of a vital question, and this paper deserves credit for sounding this note of warning against the "black peril," and I trust that neither Pennsylvania nor any other State in the Union may ever have to drink the bitter cup which was pressed so unrelentingly to Mississippi's lips during the dark period of reconstruction. You Pennsylvanians, whether Republicans or Democrats, would not stand for an hour what we endured for long weary years, and what, by the help of God, we never intend to bear again.

Mr. Chairman, I have thus far quoted only from northern papers, and introduced only northern witnesses, and by their own testimony are they condemned.

I have said that since the practical disfranchisement of the negro he has been better contented and more prosperous than ever before, and this would continue to be true if he is "let alone;" but dangerous influences are at work fraught with untold evil to both the white and colored races. One of the first of these was the surprising practical illustration of social equality given by the President of the United States when he took a negro into his dining room at the White House and sat down to dinner with him as graciously as if he had been the governor of the State of New York. I have always been sorry that Booker Washington didn't have more sense and self-respect than to accept the invitation. It would have been infinitely to his credit if he had declined. This one incident has done more to inflame the passions of the negro and give him a perverted idea of his importance and his near approach to social equality than anything that has been done during the last ten years.

Only a few days ago in looking over the Commercial-Appeal, of Memphis, Tenn., in my judgment the greatest newspaper in the South and published so near the Mississippi line as to be par excellence the paper of Mississippi, I read a communication from one of the best known and most honorable men in the State detailing facts too horrible to contemplate as occurring within this month of March, 1904, in one of the wealthiest sections in the State where the negro population largely outnumbers the whites. The facts as stated, and in which I place implicit confidence, are so pregnant with danger that I shuddered when I read the letter. Hear what this honorable and truthful citizen says, whose name is A. G. Paxton, a lawyer and large planter, and whose post-office address is Leland, Miss.:

To the Commercial Appeal:

On Friday evening, arriving at Leland on my way to my plantation, I found an excited gathering of some of the most prominent planters and citizens of this county and was requested to remain over there to assist in looking after a matter of the highest public importance, involving the present and future peace not only of this neighborhood, but of this whole southern country. The town marshal and a justice of the peace were enlisted, and, going around to the livery stable, four men—white men—were arrested. All were taken red-handed. In their baggage we found many beautiful pictures—photographs of landscapes and other views.

These pictures, gotten up by the Whiteside View Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, they had been showing and selling to white people. In addition to this we found other photographs of the most infamous and indecent character, some white women in night robes, with portions of their persons exposed, and others of white women utterly naked, with not a rag nor a leaf to hide their exposed naked persons. One in particular represented several white women naked as they came into the world, each in the arms of a naked negro. Pictures of this character, it was proved and admitted by the men, were widely sold to negroes. None of this character had been seen or shown by them to white people. One of the last named was taken from a negro by my brother, A. J. Paxton, at Wilmot, Miss.

All of these pictures purport to have been gotten up and issued by the Whiteside View Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, whose name is printed thereon. With each set of pictures sold there was also sold a little view glass in a frame, which, I believe, is called a "stereoscope." It gives the perspective. Placing the picture in the frame and looking through, it shows like an open view-like nature. It is proper to say that the last-named picture was a representation of Bouguereau's picture, The Birth of Venus. In the original the man no doubt was white, but in the pictures being circulated the man had been colored black. Manifestly it was blacked for a purpose.

All of them claimed that they were regularly employed by the Whiteside View Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, and they stated that "this concern had not less than 100 agents scattered over the country," scattering this infamous seed of race hatred, desire for social equality, miscegenation, and lust of rape.

The three men—B. D. Shieves, L. D. Truitt, and J. H. Washburn—were tried in an orderly manner yesterday before F. H. Ivey, justice of the peace at Leland, and pleading guilty, they were each fined $40 and given in addition twenty days on the county farm, the utmost penalty provided by the law.

The conduct of the people in thus permitting the law, utterly inefficient in its penalties, to take its course, is, to say the least, a tribute to their patience and to their qualities as law-abiding and law-loving citizens.

After sentence had been pronounced and the crowd dispersed it was developed that through the mail there had been sent to one of the convicted men, B. D. Shieves, from the Royal Picture Gallery Company, of 152 Lake street, Chicago, a sample of an article for sale. Mr. Campbell, of Greenville, who prosecuted the men, and I personally looked at this sample article. It consisted of a magnificent engraving, showing President Theodore Roosevelt and Booker Washington seated at dinner in the White House. Upon a streamer on the front side of the table was printed in blazing letters the word "Equality." Accompanying this picture was a circular showing where these engravings, together with beautiful gilt frames, could be had, to wit, from the firm above named.

It may be possible, and I hope it is true, that no house in Cincinnati is responsible for these vile publications, but whether they are or not, the mischief is being done, the seeds of lust are being sown, and a harvest of shame and death will be garnered in the end. See how these pictures are associated as companion pieces. One teaching practical social equality by the man who, by virtue of an assassin's bullet, occupies the highest place in the gift of the American people, and following it to its logical end, inflaming the basest passions of a brutal nature, are the other pictures the product of a diabolical brain. Indeed, these men of Washington County, Miss., displayed the greatest forbearance in that they did not hang every infamous scoundrel engaged in this hellish traffic. The men who printed these pictures and the men who sold them are worse even than the ignorant brutes whose lustful desires they play upon.

When I think of the possibilities for harm that may flow from the dissemination of these vile prints, I am overwhelmed with apprehension. Nothing but harm can come to the negroes themselves, and the more they cultivate the idea of social equality the more dangerous becomes their position and the surer that death by violence will overtake them sooner or later. But the most appalling danger is to the women of the South, than whom no sweeter, purer, nobler ever lived in any land or in any age, and the men of the South will protect their honor if it requires the extermination of the negro to do it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SPIGHT. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] for a little more time to conclude my remarks.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield the gentleman five minutes more, which is all that I have not already allotted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for five minutes longer.

Mr. SPIGHT. As showing the evil effects of lax views on social equality of the races, I remember that I saw it stated in the public press—I think in January of this year—that in Evansville, Ind., a city of about 70,000 population, a negro who had been for some time living in open and undisturbed lewdness with a depraved white woman criminally assaulted a little white girl, and, says the Evansville Courier:

Feeling secure from the fate that is usually meted out to the perpetrators of such crimes, the negro not only made no effort to escape, but attempted to repeat his awful crime.

In the first place, it is impossible that in the South a white woman could become so depraved as to live in this relation with a negro; and, in the second place, if she did it wouldn't continue any longer than the discovery of the fact, when she would be treated to a coat of tar and feathers, if nothing worse.

I have seen it stated that as a result of these crimes a feeling of such intense hatred for the negro as a race was engendered that it became necessary to put this city of Evansville under the control of the military for a week or more, that several whites were killed, including a young woman, and that feeling ran so high that it turned upon the soldiers, who were only obeying orders, something that has never occurred in the South, and as a final result hundreds of frightened, fleeing, innocent, helpless negroes were huddled like sheep on the Kentucky side of the Ohio River begging for protection from an infuriated Indiana mob, a spectacle which has never been witnessed in the South, and under existing conditions could never occur there. Such are the fruits of teaching, for selfish purposes, the pernicious and doubly dangerous doctrines of political and social equality.

Even the more intelligent negroes are beginning to learn that the pretended love of northern Republicans is a hollow sham and that the best friends they have in the world are the southern white people. Hear the experience of a deluded Alabama negro who made the mistake of going to Chicago:

It is idle talk to say that a negro finds a welcome in Chicago. The foreigners are employed in preference as laborers, and each year the negro is driven farther back. He is ostracised as a laborer as well as in a social way. Southern people understand us, and are our friends when we keep our places; northern people are deeply prejudiced against us. I shall not return, but remain here in Birmingham the balance of my life, and shall expect to work and to prosper.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I haven't made these remarks for the purpose of arousing any unkind feeling, but to show how unjust has been the wholesale denunciation of the South by the northern press and people, and that we are all of the same flesh and blood, and that upon similar provocation we all are prone to indulge the same passion for vengeance. I have endeavored to show, too, the overshadowing danger of teaching the utterly false doctrine of political and social equality of the black and white races. All the Roosevelts that live now, ever did, or ever will live can never induce the proud-spirited, pure-blooded Anglo-Saxons of the South to accept such a damnable heresy. I have intended to show, further, that if it takes the life of every negro in the land we will protect the purity of our glorious southern womanhood and preserve our civilization, the highest and purest the world has ever known. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the Clerk to read the part of the sections of the bill on post-office railroad subsidy.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Washington to Atlanta and New Orleans, $142,728.75.

For continuing necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Kansas City, Mo., to Newton, Kans., $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I take the floor to oppose railroad-subsidy legislation. Subsidies, pure, unvarnished, and bald, are ingrafted on this bill by the majority of the committee—reluctantly, I hope—and there they rest a blot and a stain and a suspicion on us all until they are defeated by our votes. Unjustifiable, unexcused, indefensible, and inexcusable as they are, we find them here. That they are not novel, in that the bill has carried them before, is the pretense of excuse that rests in antiquity, a singular position that an admitted evil becomes a virtue by age and should be continued.

Some days ago, when our attention was called to these railroad subsidies in an able speech by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] in opposition, in a warmth of language justified by the importance of the subject and following his minority report against them, we of this side were humiliated by a bold charge made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] that these corporation subsidies were of Democratic parentage and by Democratic votes was this blot placed on our legislation. Some Democrats reminded the gentleman that Congress had been controlled for some years by the Republicans and their Post-Office Committee and their Congresses were responsible for the infamy. The gentleman, however, persisted in his contention, and in his attitude and in the whole history of this un-Democratic and un-

Republican legislation can be found the best reason for Democratic denunciation of this corporation subsidy.

So long as Democrats vote for this subsidy so long will these votes be held up and paraded in the northern Republican districts as a justification for Republican support of ship subsidy. No one knows this better than the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], with his astute political sagacity, and I would be unmindful of my duty to not warn the Democrats of the South and ask them not to throw such obstructions in our way. Safe and secure in their districts, I want to remind the Members from the South that to carry the House of Representatives they must sow the seeds of pure old-fashioned Democracy in the fertile fields of the doubtful Republican districts in the North and West. You fly in the face of the party's national good when you ingraft upon a bill by your vote this un-Democratic measure.

The other day I listened with infinite pleasure to a roll call by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] of the distinguished Southern Democrats who shed a luster from the beginning of our Government and during Democratic ascendency. With pleasure and pride I listened. They filled the office of President; they were potent in Congress; they illumined their States, and shed an imperishable renown on our national history. They served in diplomatic station abroad; everywhere where the bright pages of our country's history is found is found the names of the distinguished men of the South who molded our history. Would you follow in their footsteps? Then vote against this subsidy. In their day and generation they did not vote against principle to favor locality or special interests.

Now, it is made possible for the gentleman from Ohio to say that some depart from the traditions and policies and government of those illustrious men. Will we do so again? The gentleman from Ohio stated that he uniformly opposed this graft upon the public service, and for one I applaud his course. He set aside partisanship and fought his battles on this floor and cast his vote for the country's good. The gentleman could well have rested there and gathered his laurels from this act of public duty, without injecting the other day that Democratic influences had invited and supported this useless and unasked-for subsidy.

The ancestry of this unholy offspring of subterfuge, chicanery, and deep-laid plans is not difficult to trace. Its age is no complication in the inquiry. It is an annual product. It is born every session of Congress, and it expires when the Postmaster-General at the end of every year, forced to do so as he is by Congress and against his consent, pays out the last dollar of the $167,000 of which the people's Treasury is annually robbed. The matter as to who originated it is not vital, but Who is going to father it now? is the question of concern to the people of every Congressional district. What has gone before is a burnt issue; it is a tale that was told; but those who stand up for it in this Congress will have the burning issue directly confronting them and they must face that issue.

With regret I must admit that in former years Members from Democratic districts have come to me while we were in Committee of the Whole considering the question, where no record vote upon it could be made to go back to our constituents, and asked me as a personal favor to them to retire to the cloakroom during the vote or to be conveniently absent, yielding to me the right to go upon record in the House on roll call against it, but assuring me that parliamentary tactics (which as well could be denominated parliamentary tricks) would be resorted to to defeat the right of the House to a record vote.

To my surprise and chagrin, a motion was in each instance permitted by the Speaker, under his power of recognition, which effectually cut the House out of the right to recommit the bill with instructions to strike out railroad subsidies, and thus a record vote showing Democratic support of a railroad subsidy was stifled. Is the House proud of the record? Why is there a dispute as to the authorship of this subsidy?

Would the Democrats who voted for it last year or the year before have voted for a land subsidy to a railroad or a ship subsidy or a bounty on sugar or rice or wheat? If they vote for a railroad subsidy to carry mail, let us have a roll call, so that a record can be made here and back in our districts. Let the vote be open. In former years the vote was stifled. Mark you, the country will not stand for secrecy now in post-office matters.

In former years the Speaker who used the power of recognition to cover it up was a Republican. Those Houses that supported this unusual parliamentary procedure were Republican, and I am content to allow whatever advantage can be drawn from this action, and rest it there as to the responsibility.

Mr. SIBLEY. I would like to ask my friend if that subsidy is not used in the States of the South?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That subsidy makes a great dark line down through the southern territory.

Mr. SIBLEY. Now, then, let me ask you, is it not the case and does not every man recognize that in the South, with her industries and resources undeveloped, there are not those means of rapid communication that exist in the North, and it would be justifiable in the South where it was not justifiable in the States of New England and the Middle West?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Oh, the gentleman should not fly against his Republican administration of the Post-Office Department, which for ten years has said that Congressional influence forced this subsidy upon the appropriation bill against its recommendations.

Mr. SIBLEY. Let us be fair about this. I do not think there is any partisanship in it; it is merely a business proposition.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman will not make a speech in my time, I hope. There certainly is no partisanship in it; it rises above that. I would protect all the people and the Treasury against this graft.

Mr. SIBLEY. Now, I think there is no partisanship in it. I think that the men who realize the needs of it, in the committee and on the floor of this House, feel that we would be doing a manifest injustice to the business interests of the country, of the South, if we should not provide for it. That is the reason I now interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is a speech the gentleman can make in his own time, and I will ask him to yield me five minutes. I want to hold him to that proposition on time.

Mr. SIBLEY. I will yield to the gentleman if I have any time.

Mr. LAMB. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. LAMB. Does not the gentleman know that many good Democrats have supported this measure?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman from Ohio has so charged, and I shall not resort to any invidious comparisons.

Mr. LAMB. I would like, while on the floor, to ask the gentleman another question. He said just now that the Post-Office Department had said that Congressional influence had been used to keep this appropriation on. Will he furnish proof of so grave a charge?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I will a little later on.

Mr. LAMB. Well, I would like to have your authority on that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I will read it from the RECORD a little later on. I believe it is the duty of every Member, regardless of party, because, agreeing with my friend from Pennsylvania, it rises above partisanship, but I differ with him on the proposition: I think it is the duty to look to economy. It is our duty to pursue the lines of good government; and we can not do that by perpetrating upon the Post-Office Department, that great business department, something unasked for. It is our custom to cut down estimates of the Departments for appropriations and not to force appropriations on them against their recommendation, but we do it here if this pass.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Does not the gentleman know that in the Fifty-seventh Congress one of his colleagues on this side undertook to strike out that appropriation?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. If the gentleman says so, I will rely on his statement.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. And three-fourths of the Members on that side of the House—the Democratic side—voted against that motion.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman can present the record in his own time in support of that. I censure Democrats for voting for any subsidy.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I voted against it, notwithstanding the fact that the Louisville and Nashville, a beneficiary railroad, runs right through my home city; and I am against this as I am against any other legalized steal.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Is my colleague [Mr. HOLLIDAY] going to vote for this?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. No; I shall vote against it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman from Tennessee says that local interests may prompt some, and I have no criticism to make against such gentlemen.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Local interest does not prompt me. I denounce it as a steal, and I am against it. [Applause.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman is not going to spoil my compliment to him. Local interest may influence some Members, but the gentleman says it passes through his district and without remitting he has opposed it. I commend him for it. I want to give you instances of three other Members, conspicuous for their standing and ability, who never allow themselves to be swerved from duty by local interests, and there are many others; they likewise performed their duty, notwithstanding what might be inferred to be State interest or local interests were present to influence, and I saw their action on this floor, and I will name them standing with the gentleman from Tennessee—Senator BAILEY, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON]. They have never swerved in their devotion to Democratic principle and policy of good government, though it might affect particular interests in their districts; and I commend their example.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield to me a minute?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. About half a minute.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have consistently voted against that matter. It is a subsidy, and while it is shared in by the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, which runs through my town, I have voted against it, because the Postmaster-General has said it was not necessary now; that he could get as good service without it as he could with it, and was doing so.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And the good administration of the office demanded its rejection. I have just said that.

Mr. KLUTTZ. I think my distinguished friend from Tennessee must be mistaken. I know he would not intentionally misstate any fact, but I can find no record of such a statement by the Postmaster-General.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And I say it was so stated to me.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Well, the gentleman from Tennessee says that that was stated to him, and I will read the RECORD a little later on to prove it all.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Not the Postmaster-General, but the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, or, what is the man's name? Shallenberger; he is the man—Mr. Shallenberger.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, no advantage can be gained by flying in the face of the Democracy of the whole country, though it may seem to bring some special advantage to a particular section.

Mr. LAMB. I deny, I challenge the statement of my good friend, and say that he makes a misstatement when he makes that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Well, we will let the House judge upon the proposition when it comes to a vote. For myself I resented on each occasion the proposition of "'Walk into my parlor,' said the spider to the fly," and remained upon the floor to oppose this subsidy; and while those who asked me to stultify myself and forsake my constituency have passed from this arena of legislation back to their respective districts I remain to, in a feeble way, warn their successors that the only safe and sure way to Democratic hope and ascendency is in the performance of Democratic duty. I concede to every Democrat the right to do just what he thinks best for his district. Each is entirely without my censure.

I conceive it my duty to stand for economy, for the good of the public service, for the good of all the people. This is my notion of true Democracy. If others in pursuit of the same object travel pathways diverging from the ones I follow, I have no criticism. But I can not and will not repress myself from a note of warning. No advantage will come from yielding Democracy to special interests. The minority here has troubles enough without seeking others.

We who have served in the House for some years prior to this Congress have seen the most partisan efforts put forth and power used, from the high position of the Speaker on down, to weaken and embarrass the minority.

We have seen the deliberate loading of the minority of committees by former Speakers of the House. If a minority Member of the House could be found who was out of line with his party on a single subject, he was loaded on some committee on the minority that gave him special opportunities to accentuate divisions.

If a minority Member were from a locality whereby it was thought he would be embarrassed on a certain committee, on that committee he went, and the promotion of discord went on. This in former years was the policy with reference to all the important political committees.

The other day the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] with a glee referred to the disproportionately small number of northern Democrats on the important committees. He did not take the time nor did it seem to be within the purview of his purpose to notice the years of discrimination and the peculiar tactics resorted to against all the Democrats in committee appointments by former Republican Speakers, nor did he seem to want to know that where a northern Republican from a particular State was on an important committee that it is not the rule that a Democrat from the same State was placed thereon, making two Members of the same State on the same committee.

Under the wiser and more statesmanlike rule adopted at the beginning of this Congress, in the course of a reasonable time the gentleman's complaints will fade away and the good of the public service will be promoted. The trouble before was with the Speakers.

If the accounts may be credited, the situation is well illustrated in the gentleman's own case. He was not satisfied, it seems, with the splendid assignment on the Ways and Means Committee, but wished to retain his place also on the Banking and Currency Committee.

So long as he remained on both what Democrat from Connecticut, who might be elected, could hope to be assigned to either of those committees of which he was a member?

Take Indiana, my own State, its Members ever alert—knowing a good thing when they see it, and they usually get everything they want in sight—Indiana holds places on all the prominent committees of the House, and yet to give Democratic Members of long service a chance for membership on those committees the usual rule of double State membership on committees is overturned, and thus I hold membership on committees, as do each of my Democratic colleagues, with a Republican colleague from Indiana on the same committee. Republican rules, policies, and arbitrary action have militated against us, my Democratic colleagues, and we should do the best we can under the circumstances. Our interest will be promoted by keeping along the line of safe Democratic economy, policy, and tradition.

For my part I can not but see that a vote apparently enforced on a Member by the special interests of his district and contrary to broad Democratic doctrine is a hurt to the Democratic party. In past years we heard of Democrats favoring local interests, though running counter to general Democratic good; we heard then of Democratic White House Members, and in those years it was said that some did not scruple to curry favors for special interests in districts and secured plums from the Republican tree, as it was charged by Republican Members, for recreancy to party.

We can felicitate ourselves, I think, that no such condition now prevails. Equal rights to all, special privileges to none, is the safest rule to follow, and it can not be departed from even though that course is invited by some special or local interests or privileges that seem to come our way. The proposition of subsidy is vicious in principle. It has no support in right policy of government.

Every consideration of reasonable economy points out our duty to defeat it. The country would not stand for this special gratuity if it were presented to the people. No Congressional district would stand for it. The railroads of the country, save the two specially favored, are against it. And the people of no Congressional district would stand for a Member who votes for it if it were the only question presented in the election. As a partisan question every Democrat should vote against it. As a public question every Republican should vote against it. Happily it rises above partisanship, and the good of the country demands and the Post-Office Department—that great business Department of the Government—demands its rejection.

To stand up for principle, fundamental as it seems to me, is the duty of all. Local interests can not outweigh party fealty in matters so vital. If the barnacle is old, let us rid ourselves of it. The ship will sail better if clean. The Republicans charge us with the responsibility, and thereby they announce their willingness to aid us to remove this canker that corrodes the purity of Democratic action. Will we accept the proposition they offer to aid in its defeat or will you sail off in false and un-Democratic seas and lie under their charge and wince under their denunciation? That some Republicans want to hold this over our heads and make of it a shield for themselves should spur us on the more to the performance of our Democratic duty. Southern Democrats should not want to continue this long, dark line through the South and hamper us in the North, but by their votes should compel the Republicans, if they want it, to pass it and be responsible for it. A pretty pass it is when Republicans with any show of reason can charge Democrats with being in favor of a subsidy.

Are Democrats strengthening their position by asking favors of Republicans along Republican lines—by getting from them financial favors at the expense of the Treasury, because, perchance, the loot of the Treasury brings some public money to particular States, districts, and sections? Are Democratic principles and policies and Democratic action to be molded by the measure of where the money voted away goes? Are vicious policies to be pursued and followed, though contrary to Democracy, because it feathers the right of way through Democratic territory? What if a man gain the whole world and lose his own soul, or what if you get the whole of this miserable subsidy of $167,000 and lose your Democratic tendency? Can a Democrat who votes for it criticise any abuse of government or power, can any be heard to declaim against any paternalism?

This subsidy proposition exceeds in its viciousness any hothouse banana proposition I ever heard of.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], straightforward and just always, denounces justly and in unmeasured terms this subsidy. He characterizes it as unwise, un-Democratic, and an unwise departure from just principles, and his contentions are well supported. I am satisfied that those on this side who may feel impelled by local considerations to support this proposition will rise up hereafter and call us blessed who resist it. Let us look into this matter carefully. For something like a week the House has been agitated and the country disturbed by the Post-Office Committee report recently brought to our table.

Many upon the floor have claimed that by reason of the scandals in the Post-Office Department, that by the action of that committee in bringing in a report that names nearly 200 Members of Congress, that the Department seeks to make Congress bear its share of responsibility for irregularities in that Department. Whatever has been said or may be said here excusing Members for seeking to aid their constituencies by indorsing requests that come in the usual channels to them, I want to call to the attention of the House that in this corporation subsidy you are threatened with a real scandal that the Post-Office Department is excused from and that Congress is wholly responsible for.

The Post-Office Department in late years has decried against this loot of the Treasury, has denounced it as an interference with a proper and legitimate administration of its duties, has asked Congress to cut it out of the bill as unneeded, as injudicious; and yet Congress, innocently, has forced upon the Postmaster-General this graft appropriation, this loot of the Treasury, and brought upon itself the just charge of perpetuating this real scandal.

As a reward for the Democratic support before—because some Democrats have voted for it—the whole party stands charged today by the utterances of the sage and prognosticator of the Republican party, the gentleman from Ohio; he to whom the sunset of life gives mystical lore and to whom coming events cast their shadows before. Will you lie under these charges longer, when the Postmaster-General and his Department ask you to save yourselves and the country from this scandal? Congress, and Congress alone, is responsible.

I will read what the Post-Office Department has said on this subject as a warrant for the House to save itself from a further perpetuation of this arrant and flagrant scandal.

Now, I will give you the record—proof that was called for by the language of the gentleman in charge of the Railway Mail Service, Mr. Grant. He said:

> There seems to be no justification for the special-facilities payment, judging from results obtained. If we treated all lines on this basis, then we should pay the Northwestern Railroad for running an early morning train from Chicago at 3.45 a. m. to Fort Howard, Wis; also for Cedar Rapids from Chicago. We should also pay the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad for a train leaving Chicago at the same hour and running to Marion and the West; also the same road for a train from Chicago to Milwaukee and St. Paul; the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy for a train leaving Chicago at 3 a. m. and running to Burlington and Omaha; the Monon Route for a train leaving Chicago in the early morning for Cincinnati. The Illinois Central also has a train leaving Chicago about the same hour, as has also the Pittsburg, Fort Wayne and Chicago and the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern.

Here is the language of the Department, and I commend it to the consideration of my distinguished friend. It was the answer of the Postmaster-General, and this very question was covered:

> Well, the Department would have power to withhold it, but having recommended to Congress the advisability of withholding it, the Department is bound to assume that Congress desires the appropriation to be expended so long as it is made.

The Department came that year with this language by the Postmaster-General:

> In submitting the estimates for several years past this office has declined to include the item of special facilities, for the reason heretofore stated, but appropriations have, however, been made.

Now, the Department makes this statement, and I read from the evidence before that distinguished commission whose report we have not got, but a part of which has been put in the RECORD. This question was asked of the Postmaster-General:

> Is not the tendency where we give subsidies to one line for others to ask or expect the same kind of pay?

Does not that sound reasonable? That would be true in the case of men, and it is true in the case of corporations. Listen to the answer:

> The tendency is to produce discontent and dissatisfaction, if not hesitancy on the part of the other roads in giving us similar service without special appropriation.

This has always been the attitude of the Department. Who will deny it?

Conditions are entirely different, I will say to my colleagues, from what they were a year ago when we passed the post-office bill. Scandals have broken out in various departments; looters have been prosecuted and sent to prison.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The post-office throughout is under suspicion; the feeling against boodleism, graft, and peculation is intense throughout the country. Everybody in public life is warned to do his best and utmost to restore purity in public affairs. And woe to the man who is involved in a real scandal. Conditions are different from a year ago in this House. We have a new Speaker; we have a reorganized Post-Office Committee, and the people are looking our way with a critical eye to see who stands for and who is against reform. In this view what are we asked to do? Out of the 200,000 miles of railroads in the country, by influence—not in the Post-Office Department, not in the country, but in Congress—we are asked to select out a thousand miles of railroad, one-half of one per cent of the whole, for special favors, and make a gift to them of $167,000.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. LAMB. There is but one question I want to ask of the gentleman.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I can not yield.

Mr. LAMB. It is but a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do not yield, unless I can get more time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. For what is this gift bestowed? For the same services—that is, "to carry the mail with reasonable expedition"—which the other railroads of the country are doing without a subsidy.

We know that under the system of railroad estimation for transportation of mails it affords the most munificent remuneration—if not too much.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield. Should these two subsidized railroads, legally or morally, do less than the other railroads of the country? Why, then, is this subsidy kept up? Only because influence in Congress alone keeps it up. Talk to me about reform, of economy in administration, and then by your vote keep up this travesty on both. Oh, consistency, thou art a jewel that would shine in a London fog. To such as favor it I say: Oh, paternalism, where is thy terror? Oh, subsidy, where is thy sting?

Congress passing this subsidy, placing a stain upon itself and this blot on an otherwise "decent bill" (using the language of the gentleman from Tennessee), would justify its veto by the President; and a provision so flagrant, born of Congressional influence alone and opposed directly to the recommendations of the Post-Office Department, should cause the Postmaster-General to set aside, in this instance, the usual rules of constructon of Congressional enactment, meaning executive compliance; and by reason of its iniquity, he should feel mandated, under the Congressional utterances of the option clause, to reject it.

I am satisfied that this action would meet the sober and final conclusion of Congress and would receive the approval of all the people.

Congress should free itself from the stain. The ranking Democratic member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads has given his emphatic dissent to this enactment. What has the name of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] stood for during his long and useful career as a Member of Congress? What has it stood for as a member of the committees of which he is a member? What has it stood for in the House of Representatives? In those committees, in Congress, on this floor, in his district and State, and throughout the nation he has stood always and everywhere for sturdy honesty, for high conceptions of purity in official life, he has stood for unswerving devotion to Democratic duty. Let us follow his example. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Chairman, the condition of my health this morning, as it has been for two weeks past, rather makes me hesitate to inflict myself upon the House of Representatives for the time allowed me, and in consideration of those facts I would forbear to address the House were it not that the reports of the Post-Office Department upon the Hay resolution mention my name and involve certain considerations between the executive and legislative departments of the Government which, I think, it is important to fairly and firmly and fully discuss before my colleagues in the House of Representatives. I have heard and seen, Mr. Chairman, much comment during the debate upon this resolution, both in the House of Representatives and in the press of the country, deprecating what is characterized as hysteria upon the part of Members of Congress who have presumed to discuss this resolution in the House.

I shall endeavor in the discussion of that report to avoid anything which might be characterized as hysteria, but I do not pretend to assure the House that in my manner and remarks there may not be something which shows profound indignation, both personal and official, on account of this resolution and the anonymous report from the Post-Office Department which it has provoked. Mr. Chairman, I belive that I am safe in saying that it is almost the unanimous opinion of the House of Representatives, regardless of party, that a grave mistake has been made by some one, either in the executive or the legislative departments of this Government, in the offering of this resolution and the reporting of it with the rough and undigested mass of stuff—because it deserves no better name—which has been injected into this House by the Post-Office Department and embodied by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads as an integral part of its report.

I do not mean to say that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] or any other Member of this House need apologize for the introduction of any resolution under a correct impression of the obligations resting upon him as a Member of the House, or that he should be criticised therefor, but, sir, I submit that the reasons for such radical action against the membership of this House should be good and unequivocal. This resolution is ostensibly based upon the Bristow report of his investigations of the Post-Office Department and not of the House of Representatives, because the President of the United States has and had and can have no power or authority to authorize a member of the Executive Departments of the Government to investigate or suggest criti cism of the Members of this body.

Now, if this resolution has any justification or any excuse it must be contained in the report of Mr. Bristow. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] evidently intended that that should be the basis of his resolution, because he justifies it by the recitals in the preamble of his resolutions, which of themselves assume that certain charges have been made against Members of Congress by the report of General Bristow; and in so assuming, if that assumption be baseless, the gentleman assumes to make those charges himself. What are they, Mr. Chairman? The first basis or justification for the introduction of this resolution is contained in the first paragraph of the preamble:

Whereas Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General J. L. Bristow, in his report to the Postmaster-General dated October 24, 1903, and which report has been transmitted to a committee of this House, has charged that "long-time leases for post-office premises were canceled and the rent increased upon the recommendation of influential Representatives."

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is true that the report of Mr. Bristow contains such a statement; but in this whole discussion I have seen no law quoted, I have heard no regulation of the Post-Office Department mentioned which prohibited Members of Congress from making such recommendations.

True it is, I admit, that action upon such recommendation by an executive officer without authority of law and without the authority of some regulation would be either contrary to law or in violation of good public policy—not by the Member of Congress making such recommendation, because, indeed, that Member of Congress may be imbued with the conviction that the rental in such cases is below what other property in the same neighborhood brings for similar service, but by the executive officer.

I find no charge, no imputation, there against Members of Congress in the absence of proof that the Member of Congress was personally interested in the lease and therefore in the increased allowance for rent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, how does such a recommendation by a Congressman become the proper basis of any resolution to investigate? Is it necessary whenever a report may be made by any Department of this Government that a resolution of inquiry shall be immediately introduced, regardless of whether any serious or well-founded charge of violation of law or violation of the proprieties of the public service has been made against the Representative?

The acceptance of the proposals for lease of buildings for post-offices seems, as far as I have been able to learn, to rest in the discretion of the superintendent of the division of salaries and allowances. Of course this discretion is expected to be honestly exercised to the advantage and not to the detriment of the Government. If in its exercise it be tainted in any way by fraud or misrepresentation upon the part of the executive officer or the Congressman making the recommendation, of course a violation of law and public duty would be involved, but where no such elements appear, no Congressman can be blamed for making recommendations as to the location of such post-offices or as to what would be a fair rental. Indeed, after a search through the report of Mr. Bristow upon his investigation of the Post-Office Department, on pages 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, and 143, I find no intimation that Congressmen have transcended their duty to the public or violated any law or regulation of the Department in making such recommendations, it being always understood that this statement applies only to those cases where Congressmen are not the lessors of the property. Such cases may stand upon a different basis.

At the bottom of page 143 of Mr. Bristow's report I find the following comment by him, after a discussion of the canceling of leases, the increase of rentals over amount of proposals, and the increase of rentals after changing leases:

After the property owners in a city have been invited to submit proposals for leasing premises for post-office purposes, and such proposals have been considered by the Department, a site selected, and lease executed in accordance with the provisions of such proposal, no departmental officer should increase, either by direct or indirect method, the rental provided for in that lease without receiving additional increase of service.

While this statement is true, as a general rule, there may be many commendable exceptions, but at all events no imputation is cast in such cases upon Congressmen, in the absence of fraud or personal profit, and Mr. Bristow nowhere in his report says that there is. The gentleman from Virginia, therefore, finds no statement in the Bristow report justifying this clause of the preamble upon which he bases his resolution of investigation.

What is the next paragraph of this preamble?

Whereas it is charged in the same report that "if a Member of Congress requested an increase in the clerk hire allowed a postmaster Beavers usually complied, regardless of the merits of the case."

Suppose that Beavers did comply; he rests under indictment today. Will my brother from Virginia attempt to asseverate that this language of his report contains a charge against Members of Congress; that because Mr. Beavers, in violation of law or in violation of the regulations of the Department, granted allowances greater than he should have granted upon the recommendation of Congressmen, that was such an imputation upon Congressmen as justified a resolution of investigation unless it were coupled with the further statement and the further fact that the Congressmen had knowledge that such recommendation was in violation of law or in the teeth of some regulation of the Post-Office Department?

Why, sir, Mr. Bristow himself says on page 145 of his report, which is made the basis of the resolution, that—

The executive officer is expected to do his duty in accordance with the law and the practice of the Department. Congressmen, as a rule, want their constituents to have what they are justly entitled to and no more. It is true there are occasional exceptions to this rule, but happily such exceptions are few. But whatever may be the requests of Congressmen, the executive officer has a plain duty which the Member of Congress expects him to perform.

And of course the Member of Congress has the right to expect of the executive officer the performance of his public duty in the execution of the law and the regulations of the Department.

In the report of the committee on the Hay resolution, the following language occurs:

In the disbursement of the appropriation for rent, light, and fuel, your committee finds that in many instances recommendations in regard to changes of allowance for rent were made by Members of Congress; yet both in these cases and in the matter of increased allowances to postmasters out of the fund referred to the recommendations of Members appear clearly to have been in harmony with the long-established custom of referring to the Department applications from postmasters seeking increased accommodations.

Why, Mr. Chairman, if you will look over these cases or if my colleagues in the House will look over these cases of allowances for clerk hire, they will find that in every case, I think I am safe in saying, there is and can be no kind of imputation upon the honor or honesty or integrity or the faithful public service of the Congressman who made the recommendation.

Nay, more, Mr. Chairman, what further does Mr. Bristow say in his report on page 132? He says:

In the disbursing of these appropriations—

Which appropriations? The appropriations covering clerk hire in distributing offices and clerk hire where unusual conditions exist or unusual business is being done.

In the disbursing of these appropriations great latitude is given the Department. The amount allowed to third and fourth class offices is based upon the number of pieces of mail handled in transit, or because of some exceptional or unusual business—that is, where star routes run from a third or fourth class office the postmaster is required to make up the mail for the offices located upon these star routes, and the Department may make him an allowance for the employment of a clerk to do that work; or if the business of an office becomes abnormally large, because of unusual or unexpected conditions, a special allowance may be made for the employment of clerks to handle such business. By the wording of the statutes, wide discretion is given the Department in the assignment of this fund among the third and fourth class offices.

Furthermore, the Postmaster-General himself, in his letter of transmittal of information to the Post-Office Department, dated February 5, 1904, states:

The present law providing for allowances for clerk hire at third and fourth class post-offices on account of separating service and unusual business leaves the question of what shall be allowed entirely to the discretion of the Department. The records show, however, that this discretion was exercised arbitrarily in making allowances to many offices in excess of what was permissible under the rule or scale adopted by the Department for its guidance in such matters.

Arbitrarily granted by whom? Not by Members of Congress, but by the officer of the Department.

This statement sustaining Mr. Bristow shows that allowances for clerk hire were entirely in the discretion of the executive officer, regulated by a secret rule of the Department and not known to the Congressmen. When the executive officer granted an allowance beyond this rule he violated a regulation of the Department, but no law, and no stretch of the imagination could impugn the honor of a Congressman for recommending increased allowances, unless actual collusion with the executive officer or fraud could be shown, and it is not contended that such conditions exist here.

What is the statute? Let us discuss this matter without hysteria, but let us make a proper analysis of the report of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, of the material subsequently sent here, and of the reason and justification for the introduction of these resolutions.

The Postmaster-General—

So says the law in section 3859 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The Postmaster-General may designate offices at the intersection of mail routes as distributing or separating offices; and where any such office is of the third, fourth, or fifth class, he may make a reasonable allowance to the postmaster for the necessary cost of clerical services arising from such duty.

Who limits and who is to limit the determination of that reasonable compensation? As was said by the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] the other day, the whole matter rests in the discretion of the executive officer in the Post-Office Department, and when that executive discretion is so reposed, every Member of Congress not only has the right, but I deem it his duty, in response to the requests and demands of his constituents, to see to it that in the exercise of that discretion reasonable allowances are made in the cases of the individual postmasters who appeal to him for justice and assistance.

So it is, Mr. Chairman, with regard to cases where unusual business has accrued. As said in section 3663 of the Revised Statutes of the United States:

Whenever unusual business accrues to any post-office, the Postmaster-General shall make—

It does not say "may make," but—the Postmaster-General shall make—

The most mandatory word in the English langugage is used—"shall"— the Postmaster-General shall make a special order allowing reasonable compensation for clerical service, and a proportionate increase of salary to the postmaster during the time of such extraordinary business.

Those are the two sections of the law of the land under which Members of Congress have appealed to the Post-Office Department, and for such just and legally authorized appeal they are pilloried before the people of the United States in press and pulpit as a set of ragamuffins, a set of rogues.

I say, Mr. Chairman, if hysteria has not taken possession of the Members of the House of Representatives under such imputation cast upon them by the preamble of these resolutions, then it is time that an honest hysteria should be developed in the breast of each individual of the House of Representatives as a protest before the country against Executive Departments and everybody else for the suggestion even of impropriety in the conduct of a Member of Congress who has faithfully, intelligently, and lawfully represented his constituents.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the net result of all this is that that clause of the preamble, as a basis for charges against Congressmen, will not sustain it, because they have the right to do it.

Mr. Bristow says Members of Congress had the right to make these recommendations for increased allowances for clerk hire. Mr. Payne, the Postmaster-General, says the same thing. And it is conceded on all sides in the House that Members had such right. This right has been declared by the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. WILLIAMS, the Democratic leader on the floor of the House; by Mr. COWHERD, the minority member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and by the report of the committee itself, which recommended that the Hay resolution lay upon the table.

Why recite it, then, as a crime or as one of the offenses hinted at or charged in Mr. Bristow's report as a ground for this resolution and a justification for its introduction?

Now, Mr. Chairman, a little further on, in the next paragraph, another ground is given, and here I desire to say to my friend from the State of Virginia—and I believe he has not done it wittingly or intentionally—he makes an assumption of wrongdoing by certain of his colleagues in this House which, upon investigation, is absolutely without justification.

Whereas certain cases of an aggravated character are cited on pages 133, 134, and 135 of such report to sustain the above charges—

Now, who says they are "aggravated" cases? Will my friend from Virginia tell me who has used the words "aggravated cases" or intimated that those were aggravated cases except my friend himself in the preamble to his resolution? No one. Does Mr. Bristow say so? No. Does any executive officer, anyone connected with the executive department of the Government, say so? No. What are those cases? Why, Mr. Chairman, they are simply used in the words of Mr. Bristow in this report to serve as "illustrations" of improper allowances upon the recommendation of Congressmen, not as cases to be separated and segregated from the 100 or 151 other cases, but the cases are simply quoted as samples of the other cases which the Assistant Postmaster-General absolutely justifies in his own report, and quotes the law and the regulation of the Department which justify them.

On page 133 of Mr. Bristow's report to the Postmaster-General of the result of his investigations of the Post-Office Department Mr. Bristow says:

If a Senator, Member of Congress, or any prominent politician requested an increase in the clerk hire allowed a postmaster, Beavers usually complied, regardless of the merits of the case. When such a request came from an influential Member of Congress, Beavers would frequently write him, stating that while under the rules the postmaster was not entitled to the amount asked, yet because of your personal interest in the matter the allowance has been made. The postmaster would then be advised that at the earnest solicitation of Congressman Blank his clerk hire had been advanced, etc.

The distribution of large appropriations of public money as matters of personal favor, regardless of departmental rules and in violation of the law, can not be condoned. To illustrate (Exhibit Q).

This is the language with which Mr. Bristow introduces a statement as to the cases referred to in the third preamble of the Hay resolution, and he says they are used "to illustrate." His comment is a criticism upon the method and motive of Beavers, of which he does not approve, because, as he says later on, it seems to have been done by Beavers to curry favor with Congressmen. It is not a criticism of Congressmen and casts no imputation upon them. Members of Congress did not "distribute large appropriations of public money as matters of personal favor, regardless of departmental rules or in violation of law," because they made their recommendations to meet the demands of their constituents for better postal services. They did not know the secret departmental rule upon the subject and they violated no law, because there is no law prohibiting them from making such recommendations, nor, indeed, prohibiting the executive officer in such cases in complying with them. Why, then, should the gentleman from Virginia have labeled the cases referred to on pages 133, 134, and 135 of General Bristow's report as "aggravated cases," and made them as such the basis of a resolution to investigate the membership of the House?

The first case was that of Lestershire, N. Y., which appears on page 133 of the Postmaster-General's report. That was the case of Mr. Ray, of New York, now gracing the United States bench and formerly chairman of the great Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives. Mr. Ray made a recommendation for clerk hire. It turned out subsequently that it was not a distributing office, and solely upon that ground a charge is made against Mr. Ray of violation of the law.

The next is the case from Iowa which was recommended by Mr. COUSINS, a Member of Congress from that State, and in the very letter recommending the increase as quoted here Mr. COUSINS says that he would like to have the increase made if it may be "consistently" done.

I would ask the gentleman from Virginia, is that an aggravated case? Why should these of his colleagues be selected as the targets of scorn and public contempt and these illustrations labeled as aggravated cases, when they are simply used "to illustrate," and are absolutely as harmless and innocuous as any other cases mentioned in the list of 151?

Then we have Phoebus, Va. I do not know who represents the district in which Phœbus lies, but no Congressman makes the recommendation. The postmaster himself asks for the increase, and Mr. Beavers allows it. Yet it is one of the aggravated cases which is pointed out in the preamble to this resolution as one of the justifications and excuses for the introduction of that resolution for investigating Congressmen.

These men are pointed out with the finger of scorn, and identified by that resolution as being men particularly and peculiarly guilty in all this matter.

Pinckneyville, in Illinois, is the next of the "aggravated" cases, where allowances were made upon the recommendation of the Hon. GEORGE W. SMITH, which differs in no way from the other cases of allowances. The next is the post-office at Tryon, N. C. The recommendation for an allowance here was made by Harrison J. Barrett, an executive officer, and not a Congressman. The next case is Duquoin, Ill., recommended by Senator Mason and Congressman SMITH, and in no way differing from the other cases. John W. Langley, appointment clerk at the Census Office, and not a Member of Congress, makes the next recommendation for clerk hire at Prestonsburg, Ky. The next of the aggravated cases is at Conyers, Ga., recommended by a Democratic Member of Congress, differing in no way from the other cases of allowances of increased clerk hire and free from the suggestion that an influential Congressman had overwhelmed the virtue of the executive officer with importunities and influence. The next is Herndon, Va., where a temporary clerk was appointed and an allowance made for her. This differs in no way from the other cases except that the charge is made that Mrs. Landreau did not perform any services. Of course this should not have been permitted. It does not appear from Mr. Bristow's report that this allowance was made upon the recommendation of a Congressman. Port Deposit, Md., is the next case where the allowance after having been made was rescinded, and the Government, therefore, lost nothing.

The next of the alleged "aggravated" cases is the case of Rockville, Md., in the district which I have the honor to represent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if there has been any wrong or any crime or any laxity in the performance of public duty by me in making the recommendations for increased clerk hire at Rockville I want it ascertained, and ascertained at once. I am here to say, as the Representative of my people, and upon the profound obligation which rests upon me as a Member of this House under my oath, if there was a suggestion of wrongdoing or intimation of wrongdoing in any of those recommendations, I can say, sir, that I have here the proof of the fact that I am sustained by the Post-Office Department itself since this investigation was instituted and this resolution introduced in the House of Representatives.

Let us look at the Rockville case. The Rockville case, Mr. Chairman, is the case of a post-office about 14 miles from Washington, where mail trains pass almost hourly. It has one railroad, with numerous mails to and from Washington. Five star routes come into the town. A large portion of the population, employed in Washington, write their letters here and get their mail delivered in Rockville.

The anonymous report from the Post-Office Department states that on January 17, 1902, I personally recommended an increase in the allowance for clerk hire from $800 to $1,100, and that such increase was allowed and made effective February 1, 1902, and that I was so advised. This statement I believe to be true, although I have no personal recollection of it, and it is doubtless the fact that upon the application of the postmaster at that point I recommended to the Post-Office authorities an increase, and that increase was made up to the extent of $1,100.

When this spasm of virtue passed over the country, in order to give it indorsement, reductions must be made all along the line. A reduction is made to $360 as the maximum allowed by the regulations of the Department, not by law, mark you, because there is no law to such effect, but by the secret regulations of the Post-Office Department, unknown to myself, as it was unknown to other Members of Congress. The postmaster wired me asking me to see the Post-Office Department and to prevent the reduction. I wired from my home to the Department to hold up until I could get here and see the Postmaster-General. It was not held up. The reduction was made. I came at the first opportunity after that, upon the solicitation of the postmaster, and presented the gravity of the condition of affairs which tended to the impairment of the postal facilities and the public service there.

I appealed to General Wynne, the First Assistant Postmaster-General, to increase the amount. Mr. Wynne's reply was: "Under our regulations, $360 is all that can be allowed." I informed the postmaster. The postmaster insisted. He said: "I have to pay clerks out of my own pocket; it does not pay me—it is unfair, it is unjust, it is outrageous." I said to him, "You come with me and go to First Assistant Postmaster-General Wynne," which we did, and after one or two interviews with the Postmaster-General an inspector was sent to Rockville, and that inspector reported the gravity of the condition of affairs and recommended an increased allowance to $600 at least. That is within less than two months.

Now, what does the First Assistant Postmaster-General do? In violation of the rule, if you like to put it that way, fixing $360 as being the maximum that could be allowed, he has increased that clerk-hire allowance to $600. Is he guilty, too? I say, no! I am here to bear the responsibility without thrusting it on General Wynne, if necessary. I assume the responsibility for the increase; and I say furthermore, sir, to my colleagues here and to the public, that I am still urging the First Assistant Postmaster-General to make an additional allowance there upon the representation, on the insistence, not only by the postmaster, but by the people of Rockville, that it is necessary. I have here a petition, largely signed by the best men in the community—Democrats and Republicans—setting out the fact that the clerk hire is not sufficient, and urging the First Assistant Postmaster-General to make allowance for an additional clerk.

Let the guilt be where it may. Let my brother bring in a resolution or any other Member of the House. I assume the responsibility for that increase, and shall endeavor, and I am now endeavoring, to secure more, and will continue to importune the Post-Office Department until the postal facilities of my constituents at that point shall be proper and sufficient; and, Mr. Chairman, whatever the resolution may recite, I am willing to leave it to the people of the Sixth district of Maryland, in whose service I have so assiduously worked to secure for them all that belongs to them under the law and everything that is necessary to secure them every postal facility and convenience to which they may be entitled.

Is this an aggravated case? To prove that neither Mr. Bristow in his report nor anyone, indeed, except the gentleman from Virginia has characterized the Rockville case and the others I have mentioned previously as "aggravated cases" I will quote from Mr. Bristow's report, on page 135, where he says:

> The foregoing cases refer to clerk hire in third and fourth class offices. A hundred other similar cases could be cited.

I find that on page 135 Mr. Bristow in his report states:

> On June 14, Frank M. Page having been transferred from the post-office at Rockville elsewhere, the allowance was reduced to $800.

In reply to that covert insinuation I will call the attention of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General to the fact that Mr. Page was not appointed to the Rockville post-office upon my recommendation nor transferred from it to the Post-Office Department upon my recommendation, but that this action was taken by the Post-Office Department, in both instances, in spite of my protest.

I beg here to insert the correspondence between the Department, Mr. James P. B. Viers, the postmaster, and myself upon the matter of this reduction and subsequent increase, as well as the report of the post-office inspector:

ROCKVILLE, MD., December 7, 1903.

MR. WATERS,
Chief Salary and Allowance Division,
Post-Office Department, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Please send out the inspector as soon as you can, in regard to the matter discussed by you, General Wynne, Representative PEARRE, and myself on the 1st instant.

It is impossible to give a good service under the present arrangement.

Very respectfully,

JAMES P. B. VIERS, Postmaster.

DECEMBER 28, 1903.

POSTMASTER, Rockville, Md.

SIR: The reduction in the allowance for clerk hire at your office from $1,100 to $360 per annum has been changed to take effect from November 1, 1903, instead of October 1, 1903, as you were previously notified.

Very respectfully,

First Assistant Postmaster-General.

ROCKVILLE, MD., January 2, 1904.

FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Post-Office Department, Washington, D. C.

SIR: The inspector has not yet visited this office. My assistant has been and is now sick. I will thank you to have the inspector sent out Monday morning next.

Very respectfully,

JAMES P. B. VIERS, Postmaster.

JANUARY 9, 1904

POSTMASTER, Rockville, Md.

SIR: In connection with the inclosed notice of increase in your allowance for clerical assistance from $360 to $600 per annum, I beg to advise you that this action is based upon a report just received from a post-office inspector, and the additional $240 per annum is based upon section 309, Postal Laws and Regulations. As this increase is dated November 1, 1903, it will amount to a reduction in your allowance from $1,100 to $600 from that date.

This allowance is extremely liberal in comparison with the amounts received by other post-offices of your grade, many of which have no allowance whatever for clerk hire.

Very respectfully,

First Assistant Postmaster-General.

JANUARY 11, 1904.

Hon. GEORGE A. PEARRE, House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to state for your information in connection with your recent inquiry that upon the basis of a report of a post-office inspector, just received, the allowance for clerk hire at Rockville, Md., has been fixed at $600 per annum, to take effect November 1, 1903. This amounts to a reduction in the allowance for clerk hire from $1,100 to $600.

Very respectfully,

First Assistant Postmaster-General.

ROCKVILLE, MD., January 11, 1904.

FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Post-Office Department, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In reply to your letter of recent date informing me of the amount of clerical allowance for this office, I have to say the sum is wholly inadequate for the purpose of employing two men. I beg to recall to you your promise to me when I saw you last that you would favor such sum as the inspector, after an investigation of the office, would recommend.

The inspector, after his investigation, said to me that it was an outrage for two men to have to do the work here, and that there were conditions existing that would warrant an allowance under section 309.

I have to work fourteen hours a day, and often come back later to the office to perform work I am unable to do during the day.

I am worn out by these labors, and as a consequence have to sleep in the office like a dog.

You will please permit me to say, respectfully, that I consider this an aggravated outrage.

I make the request you will send for the inspector and have him discuss the matter to you in person, and thereafter allow the office such sum as you consider just and right.

Very respectfully,

JAMES P. B. VIERS, Postmaster.

Hon. HENRY C. PAYNE,
Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned, some of the business patrons of the Rockville, Md., post-office, in order that we may have a more prompt mail service, respectfully petition you to allow another clerk at this office.

OCTOBER 7, 1903.

Hon. GEORGE A. PEARRE, Cumberland, Md.

SIR: In reply to your recent telegram addressed to the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General I beg to advise you that on September 24 last the allowance for clerical assistance at Rockville, Md., was reduced from $1.100 to $360 per annum, to take effect October 1, 1903. This action was based upon reports from the postmaster and officials of this Department, showing that, in accordance with the present law, the latter amount is as much as can be approved for clerk hire at Rockville, that office being of the third class.

Very respectfully,

——— ———,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

ROCKVILLE, MD., March 6, 1904.

Hon. R. J. WYNNE,
First Assistant Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish to make another request that you will increase the clerical allowance for this office. That I should be compelled to do the work I do and to remain on duty from 5.30 a. m. until 7 p. m., sometimes without breakfast and often without lunch, is, I think, an outrage.

Last Monday I had neither breakfast nor lunch, and had my first meal that day at 7 o'clock at night. The following day I had my first meal at 12 m. and had to eat that in this office. Time and again I have had to go from early breakfast until 7 o'clock for a second meal. I do have to and do actually sleep in the office. This state of affairs certainly must exceed the duties of other like postmasters. Practically the whole patronage of the office is complaining of lack of mail service. The star routes are never dispatched on time and are usually very much delayed, often as late as an hour. Some of them have to meet intersecting routes, which if they fail the mail to other offices are delayed a day.

I have written to you several times about this matter since I saw you last, though I have received no reply from you. Please give it your personal attention.

Very respectfully,

JAMES P. B. VIERS,
Postmaster.

MARCH 7, 1904.

MR. JAMES P. B. VIERS,
Postmaster, Rockville, Md.

SIR: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your personal letter of the 6th instant, requesting an additional allowance for clerk hire. The allowance was increased from $360 to $600, to take effect November 1, under date of January 9 last, on recommendation of Post-Office Inspector Sharon, and on January 26 last you were directed to make a new count of the transit mail to ascertain whether any further allowance could be made under section 308, Postal Laws and Regulations. Apparently you have not reported on this request, and no further action can be taken. The Department is not warranted in making any additional allowance under section 308.

Very respectfully,

——— ———,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

MARCH 18, 1904.

Hon. G. A. PEARRE,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your verbal request of this day I beg to inclose synopsis of report made by Post-Office Inspector F. F. Sharon relative to the allowance for clerical assistance at the Rockville, Md., post-office.

Very respectfully,

J. J. HARLEY,
Acting First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Inspector's report.

Extract of report made by Post-Office Inspector F. F. Sharon relative to the allowance for clerical assistance in the Rockville, Md., post-office under date of January 5, 1904.

Inspector Sharon says the hours of service (5.30 a. m. to 7 p. m.) are long and arduous, demanding two clerks practically all the time and three during certain busy hours. The work done, he says, would require three men working eight hours per day, due, among other things, to the very numerous receipts and dispatches of mail by rail and star routes. The inspector believes that a postmaster should not be required to divert any considerable portion of his salary to the hiring of necessary help when he devotes his entire time and attention to the service, hence the inspector recommends that the clerk-hire allowance at Rockville be increased to $600 at least, which will enable the postmaster to hire one good assistant. The "unusual business clause," the inspector believes, will cover such an increase.

Now, Mr. Wynne says that was not wrong, because after the reduction was made to $360 it was increased to $600, and he has ordered another counting of the mail at Rockville, Md., in order to ascertain the fact whether he may not give a further allowance. Ah, but gentlemen may ask, "Under what law did he do it? Was it on account of its being a distributing office, or was it on account of unusual business?" Mr. Wynne, in his letter granting the increase, says that it is on account of unusual business, and the matter is still pending as to whether or not that postmaster is not entitled to additional clerk hire under the distributing provision of the law.

The increase in clerk hire at the Rockville post-office, therefore, was not "an aggravated" case, as the gentleman from Virginia will, upon investigation, I believe, admit, and the preamble to his resolution, therefore, did me grave injustice, as it did other Members mentioned in his list of "aggravated" cases.

But the criticism may be made that an allowance of $1,100 for clerk hire appears to be excessive when compared with the salary of the postmaster, which is $1,500. An examination of the gross receipts, expenses, and net revenue of Presidential post-offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, as shown on pages 702 to 815 in the Annual Report of the Post-Office Department, will show that such is not the case.

For instance, at Baltimore, Md., a first-class post-office, the salary of the postmaster is $6,000, while the allowance for clerk hire is $308,064.33; the salary of the postmaster at Annapolis, Md., is $2,500, while $3,771.74 is allowed for clerk hire; the salary of the postmaster at Cambridge, Md., is $2,000, and the clerk-hire allowance is $1,375; the salary of the postmaster at Cumberland, Md., is $2,900, and the allowance for clerk hire is $5,515.49; the salary of the postmaster at Easton, Md., is $2,100, while the clerk-hire allowance is $1,900; the salary of the postmaster at Frederick, Md., is $2,500, while his clerk-hire allowance is $3,800; the salary of the postmaster at Hagerstown, Md., is $2,700, while the clerk-hire allowance is $5,096.63; the salary of the postmaster at Lonaconing, Md., is $1,500, and the clerk-hire allowance is $1,000; the gross receipts of the post-office at Adams, Mass., are $9,914.26, the salary of the postmaster is $2,200, and the clerk-hire allowance $2,400; the salary of the postmaster at Athol, Mass., is $2,400, while the clerk-hire allowance is $4,272.28; the salary of the postmaster at Salisbury, Md., is $2,200, while the clerk-hire allowance is $3,038.59; the salary of the postmaster at Westminster, Md., is $2,300, while the clerk-hire allowance is $2,789.96; the gross receipts of the post-office at Belfast, Me., are $8,844.60, the salary of the postmaster is $2,000, while the clerk-hire allowance is $1,500.01; the salary of the postmaster at Gardiner, Me., is $2,200, while the allowance for clerk hire is $3,156.23; the salary of the postmaster at Saco, Me., is $2,000, and the allowance for clerk hire is $1,435.19; the salary of the postmaster at Cynthiana, Ky., is $2,000, and the allowance for clerk hire $1,560.51; the salary of the postmaster at Owensboro, Ky., is $2,700, and the clerk-hire allowance is $5,849.46; the salary of the postmaster at Abilene, Kans., is $2,300, while the allowance for clerk hire is $2,332.65.

These cases will serve as illustrations and are taken indiscriminately from the tables above referred to, and show that the propriety and amount of clerk-hire allowance are in no way regulated by the postmaster's salary, and that an excessive clerk-hire allowance over the postmaster's salary is no evidence of a wasteful expenditure of public moneys, nor of any violation of a public duty upon the part of the departmental officers or Members of Congress. The fact of the matter is that third and fourth class postmasters are in very many instances the hardest worked and poorest paid officials of the Government. The Department itself admits the truth of this statement, and the First Assistant Postmaster-General, in his report dated November 10, 1903, and appearing on page 81 of the report of the Post-Office Department, to which I have already referred, begins his report by recommending that the allowances for clerk hire in third-class offices be increased throughout the whole scale over what is now allowed under the secret rule of the Department.

Now, Mr. Chairman, before leaving the subject of increased allowances for clerk hire, I desire to say that in this anonymous report, alleged to contain charges made in the report of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General against Members of Congress, my name is mentioned four times in connection with the post-offices at Deer Park, Garrett County, Md.; Luke, Allegany County, Md.; Brunswick, Frederick County, Md., and Rockville, Montgomery County, Md. For the mention of my name in a report so labeled, in connection with the Luke, Deer Park, and Brunswick cases, I desire to say it is a libel upon me and in no sense responsive to the letters of the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads asking for information and documents from the Post-Office Department.

The request of the committee on the Post-Office Department was:

(1) For information as to leases which had been canceled or rent increased.

(2) Leases in which Congressmen were the lessors.

(3) Allowances for clerk hire which were excessive and have since been discontinued.

My connection with the post-office at Luke, at Brunswick, and at Deer Park involved no such conditions, and the inclusion of my name, therefore, in the compliance of the Post-Office Department with the request of the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is entirely gratuitous and without justification. Indeed, this is true with regard to a great majority of cases named in this outrageous list.

It will be observed that in a note at the beginning of this list the following language occurs:

Where no excess is shown the allowance was warranted at the time it was authorized.

An examination of the list will show that no excess is shown with regard to either Deer Park or Luke. At these two points, under the statement made by the Postmaster-General, these allowances were legal and proper when authorized.

The Brunswick case is remarkable, as I will show, and it is inconceivable, upon the theory that the man or men who prepared this anonymous report had no ulterior purpose against the Congressman, how any reference to the lease of a post-office at Brunswick should have been included in this report. The facts covering the matter appear on pages 101 and 102 of Report No. 1395, or the report labeled, in short, "Charges against Congressmen."

To verify the report I called at the office of the acting chief of the division of salaries and allowances and went over the correspondence; and as I desire to have it appear in the record of my remarks, I will quote from pages 101 and 102 of said anonymous report:

BRUNSWICK, MD.

At Brunswick, Md., in 1900, the salary of the postmaster and gross receipts of the office were $1,000 and $1,994, respectively. At that time the annual allowance for rent was $60, with an additional $18 for fuel and light.

Under date of October 23, 1900, Mr. William Schnauffer called at the Department and submitted a proposition from Mary M. Collary to erect a building 18 by 19 feet and rent it to the Department for $200 per annum. Mr. Schnauffer was introduced by Hon. GEORGE A. PEARRE in a communication as follows:

CUMBERLAND, MD., October 15, 1900.

Hon. EDWIN C. MADDEN,
Third Assistant Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This letter will introduce to you my friend Mr. William Schnauffer, of Brunswick, Md. Mr. Schnauffer is an active and influential Republican of Frederick County, and is one of the most substantial citizens of Brunswick. Any assistance and courtesy you may be able to show him will be highly appreciated by me.

Very truly, yours, GEORGE A. PEARRE.

Under date of October 23, 1900, notification of acceptance of this proposition was communicated to Congressman PEARRE in a letter, which reads as follows:

OCTOBER 23, 1900.

Hon. GEORGE A. PEARRE, Cumberland, Md.

DEAR SIR: Mr. William Schnauffer, of Brunswick, Md., called at the Department to-day with your letter of introduction of the 15th instant, addressed to Hon. Edwin C. Madden, Third Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. Schnauffer made a proposition to lease a room for use of the post-office at Brunswick, in a new building to be constructed across the street from the bank, and upon your recommendation this proposition has been accepted, and the post-office will be moved to the new building when completed, probably the 15th of January next.

Very respectfully, ————,
Acting First Assistant Postmaster-General.

While I have no recollection of this case whatever, the papers in the case above quoted clearly show that Mr. Schnauffer wrote me a letter asking for a letter of introduction to Mr. Madden, the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, without telling me what his business was with Mr. Madden. I wrote the formal letter of introduction to Mr. Madden, as requested by Mr. Schnauffer, and forwarded it to him. Mr. Schnauffer then calls upon the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, doubtless discloses his business, and is referred to the office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, where he makes the proposition referred to in the above letters, which is accepted, and then the Acting First Assistant Postmaster-General, knowing that the post-office is in my district, courteously writes me a letter stating that the lease is made upon my recommendation, doubtless construing the letter of introduction into a recommendation.

The letter bears no such construction, and the mention of this matter in this anonymous report is an outrage upon me and upon decency. I doubtless would have recommended the removal of the post-office from a little wooden box, in which it was previously kept, to a more commodious and more centrally located building if I had been asked. This case serves to show the desperate effort that has been made by the author or authors of the anonymous report to lug and drag Members of Congress into some connection with the postal scandal.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to animadvert upon my colleague from Virginia, and I am simply calling the attention of the House to this matter to show how absolutely futile, how absolutely unnecessary, and absolutely causeless this resolution, which has made this trouble in this House and cast imputations upon its membership of which they may not live to relieve themselves, how unnecessary such a resolution was.

Why, Mr. Chairman, there are a number of other things to which I would like to call attention, but I find time is passing quickly by, and I shall have to hurry on. I believe it is said if influential Congressmen went to Mr. Beavers he would grant their request at once. I find here, among the gentlemen on the Virginia delegation, that Mr. SWANSON, a very brilliant, industrious, and able representative of that State, has secured more allowances perhaps than any other man in the House of Representatives. It is not presumed by Mr. Bristow, I fancy, that Mr. SWANSON'S influence with the Republican executives of the Department under Republican administration was overwhelming to such an extent as to warp the virtue as well as the judgment of the officers of the Executive Department. Now, sir, to conclude my remarks on the introduction of this resolution, I would say that in my humble judgment there was no adequate cause for its introduction. I do not believe that the resolution should have been introduced and that, if introduced, the preamble of that resolution should not have contained the assumption of charges of guilt in Bristow's report which the language of Bristow's report, in connection with the law and the regulations of the Department therein quoted, did not justify.

To sustain my judgment upon this point I would say that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], the Democratic leader on the floor of the House, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD], the minority member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and the gentleman from Indiana, the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, have all said that there was nothing illegal or improper in the recommendations made by Congressmen for increased allowances of clerk hire, and their opinions have been sustained by the unanimous action of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, which in reporting this resolution recommended that it lie upon the table. So much for the introduction of the Hay resolution.

Now, gentlemen, what ought to have been done with it by the committee when it came here? I think that a blunder has been made, an egregious blunder. What ought to have been done with it? It was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and they reported back a unanimous report, joined in by the gentleman from Virginia, who recited these charges in the preamble to his resolution, to table the whole matter. It sneaked in the back door of this House without a sponsor, and it ought to have been kicked out the front door.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. PEARRE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman has stated that I joined in a unanimous report to lay on the table.

Mr. PEARRE. I understood it was a unanimous one.

Mr. HAY. I am not on the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, which made this report, and therefore could not have joined in it. The gentleman should have informed himself before making any such statement.

Mr. PEARRE. Then I will withdraw the statement as far as the gentleman from Virginia is concerned, and I apologize for having made it, so I hope the gentleman is satisfied with that statement.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. But the report itself was unanimous?

Mr. PEARRE. The report was unanimous, however. That was a proper disposition of it, if it had gone there and stopped. But what does the committee do? It brings a lot of slush and trash gathered up from the floors and sweepings from the waste baskets of the Post-Office Department and puts it all together and sends it up here, as what? Sends it in here as a report. From whom? Mr. Bristow? No. Mr. Bristow, I am informed by gentlemen on the floor of this House, was not responsible for it. Who is? Who is responsible for the conduct of that department of the Government if not Mr. Bristow?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And is called "charges concerning Congress."

Mr. PEARRE. And it is labeled by the committee "charges concerning Congressmen," and there is offered the very lame explanation putting the blame on the Public Printer. The trouble is, sir, every man who is responsible for anything in connection with this resolution seems, as soon as he meets the fire of indignation aroused in the breasts and hearts of his colleagues here by the wrong that has been done, tries to slip out from the responsibility and put it on somebody else.

Now, sir, my friend from Missouri says, "What else could have been done?" I will tell you what else could have been done. You could have taken the information that came with this anonymous report from the Post-Office Department, a poor bastard report, the paternity of which no one will now acknowledge, an unknown document, not of doubtful parentage, but of unknown parentage. You take the resolution introduced into the House, and in reporting upon it you bundle all this stuff up and make yourselves responsible for it by embodying it in your report as an integral part thereof. What the committee should have done, if I may be permitted to suggest, was to have gone through the report, found those portions of it which did in any way reflect on Congressmen, and report these features and none others. Or, as the committee after investigation had determined absolutely to ignore it and lay the resolution on the table, then they would have been justified in ignoring it as to the floor of the House, as they did in the committee room, the statement that had come up without any parentage at all, and report back to the House that they had examined this matter and recommended that this resolution lie on the table.

The committee had examined it: the committee knew that it was not a report from any responsible person, nor, indeed, from any individual or official of the Government. The committee had found its statements and charges to be thin, vapory, and without substance: the committee had found nothing in it, as they had found nothing which they could sustain or would sustain in the charges contained in the preamble to the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, and therefore this vague and unauthentic stuff, I respectfully submit, should not have been made a part of the report upon the resolution which the committee had laid upon the table.

I have not, Mr. Chairman, discussed that section of the preamble of the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia which contains the allegation that Members of Congress violated the law in becoming lessors of buildings to the Government of the United States to be used as post-offices, nor shall I do so to any great length.

There is doubtless a statute prohibiting such contracts between Members of Congress and the Government, contained in section 3739 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which is as follows:

> No Member of or Delegate to Congress shall, directly or indirectly, himself, or by any other person in trust for him, or for his use or benefit, or on his account undertake, execute, hold, or enjoy, in whole or in part, any contract or agreement made or entered into in behalf of the United States by any officer or person authorized to make contracts on behalf of the United States. All contracts or agreements made in violation of this section shall be void.

Mr. Beavers had no right to entertain such contracts, and, as this is confessedly at least a technical violation of the law, I shall not anticipate the judgment of the special committee thereon, but will content myself with referring to the letter of the Hon. J. L. Bristow to the Hon. JESSE OVERSTREET, chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, dated January 25, 1904, which refers to the Geneseo, N. Y., post-office lease, the Lawrence, Kans., post-office lease, and the Station A, Winsted, Conn., lease.

In the closing sentence of that letter Mr. Bristow says:

> In none of the above cases does it appear that the Government has paid an excessive rental. I referred to these cases in my report, not because there was any fraud indicated in the business transaction, but solely because such contracts appeared to be in violation of the statute above mentioned.

There are other cases of leases to Congressmen referred to in the anonymous report, but in some of these cases, at least, it is the fact that the Congressmen leased their property at the request of the Government. As stated by the committee in its report on the Hay resolution, on page 3, in the very limited number of leases, three in all, where the property was owned by Members of the House, it appears that the Government was itself desirous of securing the property for post-office purposes, and that the rental was entirely satisfactory to the Government, and that in each case the original lease of the building for post-office purposes was made at a time when the owner of the building was not a Member of the House.

Now, there is in this report, but not quoted in the report of the committee, a statement or two from the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General which, it strikes me, is absolutely gratuitous.

> Congressmen, as a rule, want their constituents to have what they are justly entitled to and no more. It is true that there are occasional exceptions to this rule, but happily such exceptions are few. But whatever may be the request of the Congressman, the executive officer has a plain duty which the Member of Congress expects him to perform.

Mr. Bristow further says, on page 141 of his report, in discussing the canceling of leases:

> It will be observed that instead of using this authority given by Congress to make long-time leases to secure better buildings for less money it has been used for the benefit of "grafters" who seek to pillage the public revenues.

Who gave Mr. Bristow the authority or right to criticise Members of Congress in any such language? When he says there are exceptions, but the exceptions are few, he rests an imputation upon every individual Member of the House of Representatives, because he does not separate the sheep from the goats. These few may include you, and that statement, couched in such language, includes the membership of the House. I say it was a piece of impudent effrontery upon the part of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General or upon the part of anyone who justified or sanctioned that statement, until an investigation be made and these Members of the House of Representatives who have lapsed from public virtue may be identified and properly characterized.

There is a larger question than all of these special personal matters involved, and that is the relations which shall subsist in the future between the great Executive Departments of this Government and its legislative department. If I know anything about the Constitution of my country, if I know anything of the growth of civil liberty, democratic and republican government, I know this: That in a democracy the people are supposed to be the rulers; and in every form of government adopted by a democracy that body which is closest to the people, and which most nearly represents the will and wishes of the people, should be the predominant and controlling power of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I will yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. PEARRE. Why, sir, under the constitutional monarchy of England is the House of Lords the predominant party, is the King the controlling factor? No, sir. The House of Commons rules the country, as the House of Representatives should rule the Government of the United States. We are the last to come from the people and we are the first to return to them; we are in touch with their sympathies, their motives, their aspirations, and their wishes, and it is here, sir, that the great heart of the people within the bosom of this popular body reposes, and here we feel every pulsation of the great heart of the people. [Applause.]

Let any man beware, sir, whether high or low, how he casts imputations upon the tribunes and representatives of the people of the United States in the House of Representatives assembled. [Applause.]

One by one the ancient rights and prerogatives of the House of Representatives have been curtailed by the aggression of the executive department and the Senate of the United States, until the House has almost degenerated into a mere body to ratify the will of the Executive or the whim of the Senate.

Let it not be forgotten, sir, that authority in this Republic is not vested in one man or set of men, but that the elements of sovereignty of the state have been wisely divided into the executive, legislative, and judicial; that in our theory of government no one of these is presumed to predominate over the other, but supreme within their respective spheres and coordinating their respective powers in making up the sum total of national sovereignty, neither of them can be shorn of their proper function without detriment to the state and without danger to civil liberty.

The time has about arrived when the House of Representatives should issue a declaration of independence and maintain the integrity of its powers and membership. Are we to be told that Members of Congress may no longer visit the various Executive Departments and make representations and recommendations for their constituents, who live many miles from the seat of government and have no other way of securing the ear of the executive officers?

Why, sir, the President of the United States invites Members of Congress and Senators to see him and counsel with him in regard to great public policies, but now we are learning the lesson from subordinates in the Post-Office Department that we will not be permitted to advise with them or make recommendations within the limit of the law without an aspersion of our motives. I spurn such an insinuation, and I cast it back in the teeth of any man who has made a suggestion of improper conduct on my part as a representative of the people. I cast back the charge with contemptuous indignation, which the subject and the individual deserves. Let it be understood that here in the House of Representatives and throughout the country that the individual Members are imbued with as sensitive an honor as is the President in the White House or any other citizen; that the membership of this House, lofty and noble in its purpose and aspirations, determined to serve the people, many of them with great sacrifice, is as sensitive to every appeal of honor as any man connected with the Government of the United States. [Applause.]

Oh, Mr. Bristow charges us, does he? And what do we do? We have an investigation of the Members of Congress, if you please, in this report, but no investigation of Mr. Bristow. I am to be pilloried for the Rockville post-office, and we are all to be labeled as scamps and grafters and as looters of the Treasury, as the public press tells us, and yet Mr. Bristow, mentioned two or three times in this report as having made excessive recommendations—one to the extent of $440—is not to be investigated! And, forsooth, he is not only to investigate the Cuban postal frauds and all frauds in the Post-Office Department, but now he has obtained by his own appointment the dignified and exalted position of being the critic of the House of Representatives, and endeavors to hector the Members to his behests.

Here, sir, on pages 12 and 13 of the anonymous report, I find that the Hon. J. L. Bristow, the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General and the self-constituted investigator and critic of the House of Representatives, the membership of which he has condemned by insinuation for making recommendations for increased clerk hire, recommended an increase at the Erie post-office, in Kansas, from $50 to $180, which was $130 in excess of the regulations of the Department. On page 13 I find that, together with the Hon. C. I. LONG, the Hon. J. L. Bristow, Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General and critic aforesaid, recommended at the Kingman post-office, in Kansas, an allowance of $500, which was $440 in excess of the proper allowance under the rule of the Department.

It is clear, therefore, that of all the men mentioned in this report as having violated the post-office regulations and the proprieties of the public service Hon. J. L. Bristow is the most guilty. Members of Congress who made recommendations for excessive allowances did not know, it is admitted, that the allowances were in excess of the amount fixed by the secret regulations of the Department; but this same justification can not be pleaded in Mr. Bristow's defense in the cases of the Erie and Kingman (Kans.) post-offices. He, as one of the Assistant Postmasters-General of the Government of the United States, knew the regulations of the Department which fixed the allowances, and when, therefore, he made recommendations of excessive allowances for clerk hire he did it knowing the rule, and thus knowingly violated it.

Does it lie in Mr. Bristow's mouth to say that most of the Members are honest, but that there are exceptions? Let the House, by appropriate action, investigate the investigator and ascertain what is at the bottom of this outrageous imposition upon the dignity, the rights, the integrity, the privileges, and the honor of the House of Representatives. [Loud applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GROSVENOR having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 1956. An act to authorize an exchange of sites for the public buildings of Garland County, Ark.; and

H. R. 2193. An act for the relief of David Tweed.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 12446) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 4402. An act permitting the building of a railway bridge across the Red Lake River at the city of Thief River Falls, in the county of Red Lake and State of Minnesota;

S. 4453. An act to amend section 17 of the act of Congress approved June 6, 1902, entitled "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes;"

S. 3180. An act to provide for the erection of a public building at Atlanta, Ga.;

S. 2268. An act to authorize the Absentee Wyandotte Indians to select certain lands, and for other purposes; and

S. 4849. An act granting an honorable discharge to Peter Green.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I expect to devote my remarks chiefly to certain provisions contained in the pending bill. I shall have little to say about the Bristow report. I have examined it with a good deal of care, and in my opinion no fact stated in that report reflects upon the integrity or the honor of a single Member of this House.

My judgment is that some Members of the House have put an improper construction upon the report. They have altogether mistaken its import. The Bristow investigation did not include Members of Congress at all. It was an investigation of alleged shortcomings of certain executive officers in the Post-Office Department, and Members of Congress were named or their recommendations were referred to simply for the purpose of illustrating the methods of the superintendent of the salary and allowance division of that Department. It was charged that Mr. Beavers, the superintendent of that division, made improvident allowances.

It was at no time charged that improper requests were made by Congressmen. The Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General does not pretend to say that any Member of the House made an improper request of Mr. Beavers, but he does say that Mr. Beavers granted requests without any regard to the merits of the case. Members of the House in making recommendations had the right to expect they would be decided according to law. Properly construed, I do not conceive the Bristow report to impute illegality or dishonesty to the conduct of a single Member of the House.

The bill under consideration is the largest of all the great supply bills of this Government. In round figures it carries $170,000,000—an enormous sum. This great amount of money for postal purposes shows to some extent the increase in business in the United States during the recent period of our national existence. I listened with a great deal of interest and profit a day or two ago to the able and philosophical address of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] in relation to the dangerous tendency to unduly increase the general appropriations, and the thought occurred to me during the course of his remarks that these increased appropriations are called for largely because of the high standard of living that exists throughout the civilized world. They are called for by the greatly multiplied wants of modern civilization.

The people demand more and they have a right to expect more from the Government to-day than at any other time in history. They supply themselves with more of the comforts and conveniences of life through their own individual and private agencies, and they expect correspondingly more from the Government. But, after all, Mr. Chairman, there is great danger of extravagance and waste, and it is the duty of Congress to hold appropriations within reasonable limits, to be exceedingly careful not to appropriate moneys for enterprises that are not helpful. The people of the country are willing to pay taxes, provided always that they receive an adequate return for the money which they pay.

Mr. Chairman, among other provisions of this bill is one carrying an appropriation of about $145,000 to facilitate the mails between the city of Washington and the city of New Orleans, known as the "southern subsidy proposition." This appropriation has been attacked regularly every year for the last five years. This is the third or fourth time that I have spoken against it. Notwithstanding it seems that the private judgment of a large number—I believe I may say a large majority—of the Members of the House is against the proposition, yet, somehow or other, the appropriation always goes through.

This appropriation was first made to the Southern road in 1893. At that time the gross receipts of that line of roads as statutory pay from the Government for carrying the mails was $382,000, being at the rate of $335 per mile per year. There are about 185,000 miles of railroad in the United States, and something like twenty-seven hundred and fifty railway mail routes, and the average statutory pay for carrying the mails throughout the country is in the neighborhood of $180 per mile per year.

At the time this subsidy was voted this line of road was receiving, in the way of statutory pay, from the Government $335 per mile—almost twice the average throughout the country. The Southern road and a road from Kansas City, Mo., to the town of Newton, Kans., are the only two lines of road in all the network of railroads throughout the United States that are getting special pay for carrying the mails.

Mr. FINLEY. I should like to ask the gentleman whether he has observed this provision of the bill on page 23:

For marine postal service, Detroit, Mich., $4,500.

Has the gentleman read that?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes, sir, I have; and I heard the provision explained. That is an appropriation made to provide for receiving and delivering mails in boats while in motion on the Detroit River.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman will allow me to ask him whether the real practical effect of that provision is not simply to expedite the delivery of mails from boats passing up and down the lakes; in other words, expediting the delivery of the mails?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I assume, of course, that is the purpose.

Mr. FINLEY. And it is for special facilities; that is true, is it not?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. Then how does the gentleman differentiate that case from the appropriation for the Southern Railroad and for the railroad from Kansas City to Newton, both of those appropriations being in effect for special facilities?

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] permit me to make a short explanation of the marine mail service at Detroit?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have some ideas in regard to the matter, and I would prefer not to yield just now. Why, sir, it is the easiest thing in the world to make the differentiation, because the service at Detroit is peculiar and exceptional. There is no similarity between them at all.

We have no regular schedule of pay for the receipt and delivery of mail under those circumstances. But for carrying the mails between the city of Washington and New Orleans we have a regular rate fixed by statute, the same rate that is fixed for carrying the mails between New York and Boston and Chicago and all the great cities of the country, the same rate that all lines of railroad throughout the length and breadth of the land are willing to accept—a rate satisfactory everywhere. But the lines of railroad now receiving this subsidy do not furnish additional facilities on account of this special appropriation. It is, in my judgment, a pure gratuity.

Mr. FINLEY. Does not the gentleman know that the boats provided for in the appropriation I have read are boats which intercept the boats going to and from Detroit and carrying the mail? And in that way is not the "marine postal service" provided for at Detroit of practically the same character as the "special facilities" for which the Government pays as such? Is not that true?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That may be true.

Mr. FINLEY again rose.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I prefer that the gentleman should make his speech in his own time. My time is limited.

The analogy which the gentleman has just suggested applies to every railroad in the country. The railroads carrying the mails to the West—the lines from New York to Chicago—make connections for the Pacific coast. It might as well be claimed that they are furnishing special facilities for the Pacific coast mail, on the same principle that the transmission of mails to the South over the Southern road is claimed to afford special facilities. They all make important connections for mail, express, and passenger business, and all the roads do the work for the statutory pay except the Southern.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit me a moment? I have charge of the time in the absence of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET]; and if I use some of the gentleman's time, I will yield him further time. I wish to say a word in answer to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. In answer to the query of the gentleman from South Carolina, I wish to explain that the distinction between the subsidy provided for the transportation of the mails from Washington to New Orleans and also for that from Kansas City to Newton and the appropriation for the marine postal service at Detroit is, as claimed by those who oppose the subsidy to these railroads, that an additional payment is made for service that the railroads are obligated to, and would otherwise, render, while with the marine mail service no other facility is provided, nor allowance made for the delivery of the mails to the thousands of seamen whose trade confines them, for more than six months, to these merchant vessels plying the Lakes.

True, this is a means of expediting the service. All our mail service is that in one sense. In many instances the only place where they are able to obtain their mail is at that designated point, Detroit, and it is by means of this boat, which there transfers the mails to the passing ships, that they enjoy the benefits of our postal service.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] has made a very satisfactory explanation of the "marine postal service" at Detroit.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the statutory pay of the line of road from Washington to New Orleans at the present time is over $800,000 a year. It has more than doubled since this special-facility appropriation was originally made. The statutory pay now is nearly $300,000 a year more than the statutory pay and subsidy combined when the subsidy was originally voted. This is an important line of railroad. It does a large passenger traffic and a great express business. It runs through a splendid portion of the country, and there is no reason at all why this subsidy should continue to be voted year after year. It is granted notwithstanding the Postal Commission a few years ago recommended its discontinuance; notwithstanding Postmaster-General after Postmaster-General has recommended its discontinuance.

Mr. MAYNARD. I should like to ask the gentleman whether in any of the evidence that has been before the committee there is anything to designate what these special facilities are for which this amount of money is appropriated?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Originally there was an arrangement by which the Southern road was to put on an extra fast train to run between the city of Washington and the city of New Orleans, and that train still runs. That train is necessary for the conduct of the business of the railroad. It can not be dispensed with.

It is necessary for the road to make the time and connections that it does make. The passenger and express business demands it. It is the same kind of a train that the Louisville and Nashville road runs from Cincinnati to New Orleans, and substantially the same kind of a train that the Illinois Central road runs from Chicago to New Orleans, and those roads carry mail for the statutory pay, and their earnings for carrying mail is much below the statutory earnings of the Southern line from Washington to New Orleans.

Now, I say every officer of the Government who has examined into this question and has reported to Congress on it has recommended the discontinuance of the appropriation. There is a proviso in the bill vesting the expenditure of the money in the discretion of the Postmaster-General; but two or three years ago the Second Assistant Postmaster-General said that the appropriation was made against the recommendation of the Postmaster-General, and that the Department interpreted that action to mean that Congress desired the money to be expended without regard to the question of benefits. He said in that hearing that the Postmaster-General would continue to expend the appropriation as long as Congress continued to make it, even though it attached to it the discretionary proviso.

Mr. LAMB. Will my friend point out where and when the Postmaster-General recommended a discontinuance of this appropriation?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I can not.

Mr. LAMB. I do not think the gentleman can do it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No, I can not, because I am not sufficiently familiar with the history of the matter.

I remember taking it up two or three years ago, and I made a speech in which I quoted the language of General Shallenberger in which he said that Postmaster-General Wilson had recommended against it. He said the Postal Commission had recommended against it, and he said it embarrassed the administration of the Post-Office Department, because it excited criticism and jealousy upon the part of other roads that were performing the same kind of service exactly for the statutory pay.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have this proposition to make: I hope the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], who dissented from the recommendation of the committee upon this appropriation, will follow up his dissent, and if the appropriation should not be stricken out by the Committee of the Whole, that he will make a motion to commit the bill with instructions that the committee report it back at once, omitting the Southern subsidy appropriation. This will afford Members of the House who are talking so loudly against subsidies and corporations an opportunity to go on record, with their views in permanent form.

Mr. LAMB. Can my friend point out how this is a subsidy and by what means he characterizes it as a subsidy?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have undertaken to show that it is a subsidy because it does not bring to the Government a single additional facility. It may accelerate the speed of a train now and then, but there is no fair equivalent for the money. This road does not run any faster trains than the other great trunk lines that carry the mails for the statutory pay. It is receiving three or four times the statutory pay now of the average of the railway mail routes in the United States, and it furnishes no additional advantages. Its statutory pay is nearly $300,000 more a year than its statutory pay and the subsidy together were ten years ago; and if we are ever to discontinue this appropriation, in the name of justice when shall it be?

Is it to go on forever? The country through which this line of road runs is the oldest territory of the United States. It is well-settled country, dotted over with thrifty, enterprising commercial towns and cities. The passenger, mail, and express connections of the road are important all along the line, so it is compelled to run its trains upon substantially the same schedule that it now does to accommodate its own business.

If this hundred and sixty-odd thousand dollars is stricken out, we can add probably $20 a year to the salaries of the rural-delivery carriers without increasing the aggregate in the bill. [Applause.] I believe that that would be a good arrangement. The carriers are compelled to expend from $250 to $300 to procure an outfit, and they must maintain two horses, travel from 20 to 30 miles a day for three hundred days in the year, and get but $600 for it all. They would appreciate this $167,000 if it were equitably distributed among them.

Mr. BOWIE. Does the gentleman know how much was actually paid to the Southern Railroad on account of that appropriation?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have not examined the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, but I think there were $15,000 or $20,000 deducted for fines.

Mr. BOWIE. I was informed that they were paid about $80,000 last year. Now, there are over 20,000 letter carriers, and within the next year there will probably be 30,000. This will leave about $80,000, so that that would be about $3 apiece instead of $20.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Even if it was $3, they would appreciate it; but I can not accept the gentleman's figures.

Mr. BOWIE. I expect to give it to them myself—two or three dollars—and a good deal more.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, I wish to devote the balance of my time to the rural free-delivery service. Splendid as the service is now, it is in the formative stage of development yet. It carries with it perhaps greater blessings than any other modern facility of government. It enhances the measure of happiness in rural life, and that is one of the things which have been the concern of statesmen and philosophers for the last fifty years.

There was a time in the history of civilization when the aristocrats lived on the farm, but in modern times the great cities monopolize the features that charm and fascinate, and the ambitious and enterprising have been attracted to the cities. Farm life is regarded as too prosy, and it lacks the convenience and advantages that modern young Americans desire. But conditions are gradually changing. Good roads are being constructed all over the country. Telephone service is being supplied to the farm, means of husbandry are greatly improved, and with the free rural mail service a revolution will take place in relation to the desirable residential portion of the country.

In my judgment, if we keep on improving the conditions of country life, the pleasure hunters of the land will again be occupants of the farm. The farms are the great conservators of safety in our civilization. Farm homes contain the very best virtues of individual and collective life.

I believe in perfecting this splendid system as rapidly as it can be done with a reasonable expenditure of public funds. We can not do everything in a single year.

The men who carry the mails into the country are poorly paid. Their salaries are too small. I believe in making a substantial increase in their allowances. I do not favor the salary proposition contained in the pending bill. The bill provides for a maximum salary of $720 a year. Let members of the committee bear in mind that the bill does not increase the salary of a rural carrier a single dollar, but it provides the maximum amount, beyond which the Post-Office Department can not go. It simply authorizes the Postmaster-General to increase the salaries if he desires to.

If this bill shall become law not a single carrier will get any increase of salary unless the Post-Office Department in its discretion shall grant that increase. It vests in the Post-Office Department a discretion to fix, classify, and arrange the salaries upon any kind of theory it may adopt. If there is one thing, Mr. Chairman, that Congress ought to do, it is to reduce the discretion of the administrative officers to the lowest minimum consistent with efficient administration. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman whether the wording in the present bill as to the payment of salaries to rural mail carriers is not in the same language as the present law?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is; and that is the reason——

Mr. STAFFORD. And that the present carriers receive $600 a year for their service?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The maximum salary is now $600 a year. The Postmaster-General reports that carriers are paid from two to six hundred dollars a year. I have in my district, in one county where there is complete county service, a town from which six or seven carriers leave, and they all do substantially the same work, and yet about half of them get a salary of $600 and the others only $500. They all travel over about the same number of miles, but some of the routes have less than 100 houses on them, and their salaries are cut $100 a year on that account.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. A question.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do any rural carriers who cover 20 miles or more receive less than $600 a year?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have a letter in my pocket now from a carrier in the State of Indiana who says his route is twenty-four and a fraction miles long and he is receiving only $500 a year because there are less than a hundred houses on his route. That is an illustration, Mr. Chairman, of the result of vesting discretion in Departments. That discretion is apt to be operated upon some theoretical basis utterly void of practical benefits. It is necessary, I concede, in many instances, that a wide discretion be given to executive officers, but Congress ought to fix uniform salaries whenever it can be done fairly. Congress ought to establish regulations for public business as far as they can be permanent and uniform.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman in mind any route 20 miles or more in length and having a hundred families resident along it where the carrier does not receive $600 a year?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No; I have not. The schedule or classification of salaries reported by the Postmaster-General fixes the pay on all routes not less than 20 miles in length at $600.

Mr. STAFFORD. But is not there a further regulation that requires 100 families to be resident along a proposed route before the service will be established?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, it is not expressed in the report. A route must contain 100 families now before it will be established. Imagine the situation at the town I referred to, where six or seven carriers go out of the same post-office, all substantially traveling the same distance and some receiving $600 and others only $500 a year!

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman advocate making the salary of $720 payable to carriers who travel but 10 miles?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No; I would not do that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Or 15 miles?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. My idea is that where the service is substantially the same the salary ought to be uniform. It is impossible to have absolute justice. We can only approximate equality.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not the salary of $600 paid uniformly where the carrier serves a route along which 100 families or more are resident?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. On that hypothesis——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield ten minutes further to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield for a question.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not think these salaries ought to be put on a mileage basis of $30 a mile or $35 a mile?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I believe in that plan. I have an amendment which I propose to have put in the RECORD, not that I shall insist upon its exact provisions, but in the hope that it may suggest the basis of a feasible plan. It provides for a uniform salary of $750 a year upon all routes upward of 20 miles in length. It takes a carrier substantially all of his time to serve upon a 20-mile route every day in a year, and the salaries on routes about that length ought to be uniform. Salaries can not be adjusted so nicely that the pay will conform with perfect equality to the amount of work done. A postmaster of the third class who receives a salary of $1,950 a year is compelled to pay all of the clerk hire out of his salary. The moment the salary gets to be $2,000 a year the Government provides him with an assistant postmaster and pays all the clerk hire. There is no justice or equality in that. It does not approximate equality.

Now, I say, practical equality is all we can attain, and therefore, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of a uniform salary of $750 a year (I fix that sum for the reason it is recommended by the Post-Office Department) on all routes of 20 miles and upward and a salary of $35 per mile per annum upon all routes below 20 miles, counting the distance from the post-office and counting fractions over half a mile. That takes the whole question of rural carriers' salaries out of the discretion of the Post-Office Department, and it will save Members of the House the bother and the annoyance of importuning Department officers with a discretion for an increased allowance upon the ground that the route contains hills, bridges, mud, and the like. Gentleman know what that means and what it may lead to.

Mr. Chairman, I send my proposed amendment to the Clerk's desk to be read at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

On and after July 1, 1904, letter carriers of the rural free-delivery service who carry upon routes 20 miles or more in length, measuring from the post-office from which the carriers start, shall receive an annual salary of $750; and those who carry upon routes less than 20 miles in length shall receive $35 per annum for each mile and each fraction over one-half mile contained in their respective routes, and no other or further allowance or salary shall be paid to said carriers.

I believe the time has not yet come for a graduated scale of salaries.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have only a few minutes left, and I have twenty ideas to deliver in that time. I hope the gentleman will pardon me. Mr. Chairman, ultimately it may be that this service will be placed on a graduated scale of pay, but the important thing now is to pay a fair salary for the service and to extend the benefits of the service as much as possible into localities that do not enjoy it now. Let us extend it and allow the service to mature and develop, so that it will pay a larger share of the cost of its maintenance than it does at this time. The receipts from the service are constantly increasing on account of the increased use of the mails, and in time the rural service will come near paying its own cost.

For the present let us provide a reasonable increase in the pay of carriers, and later on, if the service develops as we all have reason to believe it will, we can make another increase. City carriers were paid no more than rural carriers are paid now when city service was as young as the rural service now is. I believe a uniform salary of $750 a year is all that the condition of the service and the revenues of the country will justify at this time.

Now, in relation to carrying parcels, I do not believe that public officers ought to be allowed to represent private enterprises.

If we pay $750 a year to rural carriers, we ought not to allow the carriers to engage in any side lines of business during the hours of their official duties. The result of that policy, where the salary is fixed and the only opportunity the officer has to increase his income is to extend his private business, will be that his energy and thought will be directed to the development of his private business at the expense of the public. Besides he will serve where he can get the best pay, and the result will be rivalry and jealousy between those competing for his services. It violates sound public policy.

But, as I have said, the rural service is for the benefit of those living in the country, and the carrier ought to be permitted, yes, he ought to be required under reasonable regulations adopted by the Postmaster-General, to carry packages of reasonable bulk and weight upon the special request of any patron on his line so far as it will not conflict with his official duty. I do not believe that would interfere with the service. It would greatly promote the comfort, happiness, and convenience of the people living in the country. Farmers often at the busy season of the year may want something from town, and it would be a great convenience if the carriers could serve them.

The Postmaster-General can adopt regulations that will prevent abuses. He may require a written order in every instance, and a weekly report by the carrier showing the number and character of errands performed, the compensation received, and the like. But this convenience is demanded by the patrons of the rural service through the country, and there will be great disappointment if it shall not be granted. I have had more letters, inspired by proper motives, from the farmers living in the country protesting against the proposition to take from the carriers the right to serve them in these particulars than upon any other aspect of the service.

There are other provisions in this bill, Mr. Chairman, that may not meet my judgment, but in the criticisms I have made I want it understood that I cast no reflection upon the intelligence, the judgment, or the fidelity of the committee that reported this bill. In a body of this kind we have various views, and a bill of this importance reported by a committee of the House must, in a measure, be a compromise. I have nothing but words of commendation for the splendid work that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads has done.

I have submitted what I believe to be just criticisms upon two important provisions in the bill. I believe that the Southern subsidy ought to be voted out of the bill. I believe that the pay of the rural carriers ought to be increased and that it ought to be put upon a uniform basis as far as possible. Let the increase be a reasonable one, and as the service grows and pays a larger percentage of its cost of maintenance, further increases can be made. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I will now ask the gentleman from Tennessee to use some of his time.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE].

[Mr. GOLDFOGLE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN].

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Chairman, early in the session I introduced a bill providing for the payment of salaries of $900 per annum to rural mail carriers. The Postmaster-General in his report recommends that they be paid $750, which amount I think entirely inadequate.

In discussing this question it is well to bear in mind the fact that there are other considerations than that of the mere money involved; considerations which should claim the attention of every Member of this body, for they touch not the carriers only but some 25,000,000 farmers, who have the right to expect fair treatment at our hands.

The rapid decline in the number of the more prosperous residents in the country, and the consequent increase of population in our towns and cities indicate a most unhealthy condition in our industrial policy, a condition which, if not altered, must lead to grave consequences.

The intelligent citizen of this day, whether on the farm, in the store, in the factory, or whatever may be his avocation, wants to be ever in touch with the public pulse and wants to enjoy at least a portion of the comforts and conveniences of life. In too many instances, rather than lead a life of isolation and have his family and himself deprived of so many of the conveniences and even necessities of these days, the rural citizen will leave his home, place his lands in the hands of improvident and irresponsible tenants, and move to the towns and cities where better advantages are offered.

This is no exaggeration; it is but the plain truth. I have seen some of the most intelligent and thrifty rural communities of my own State broken up, and I have seen the congestion of our towns and cities, small as they are, and the cause is usually traceable to a disposition to get away from the loneliness and the lack of educational facilities of the country and to seek the conveniences which the towns afford.

It is a principle so well understood that I need scarcely repeat it, "that our prosperity may be measured largely by the productions of our soil." This, in the last analysis, is the foundation of wealth, and anything that contributes to a contented and prosperous rural population contributes to the wealth of the nation.

That man will be fortunate and a benefactor indeed who can devise any measure of public policy that will contribute to the contentment and prosperity of that portion of our people who till the soil and whose labors contribute so largely to the wealth of our country. The agriculturists of the United States constitute practically one-half of our entire population, and if this Government can afford to send armies and navies to right the wrongs of the Cubans and the far-away Filipinos it can certainly afford to make a reasonable annual allowance to carry the mails to our own people. [Applause.]

Personally I am in favor of spending the money at home, amongst the people who pay the taxes, support the Government, and fight the battles of the country, and whom we are sent here to represent. [Applause.] Only a few generations have passed since our Southern States were dotted all over with attractive and hospitable country homes, surrounded by all that could possibly add to the comfort and pleasure as well as the education and refinement of their owners.

That was a population representing the highest degree of everything desirable in citizenship. These were the homes of virtue, intelligence, and patriotism, and from them came young men whose wisdom, courage, and devotion to duty made them worthy and eminent citizens of the Republic. But with the rapid advancement in the modes of travel, the facilities for the spread of information through the towns and cities, life in the country became, in comparison, slow and irksome.

People on the farm felt that they were not keeping step with the progress of the age in which they were living. The result is that many of these splendid country homes have been deserted, and we are losing the benefit of a good part of that honest, virtuous, and strong population that a wholesome and attractive country life always furnishes. [Applause.]

All the surplus wealth of the country is to-day concentrated in the cities and large towns. We should offer every possible inducement for the educated man to engage in the honorable and happy pursuit of agriculture. We want him to have every convenience of the town that it is possible for him to have and all the encouragement the Post-Office and Agricultural Departments can possibly give him to put farming on as sound scientific and financial basis as are the other vocations. [Applause.]

I do not advocate paternalism on the part of the Government, but I do say that the Government should lose no opportunity of granting the demands of rural districts, when those demands are based on justice and are simply in line with such as have been granted to more populous sections. In South Carolina, realizing the necessity for making country life more attractive, the legislature at its last session passed an act providing free rural public school libraries.

Another act along the same line gives one or more scholarships annually in Clemson College, one of the best institutions of its kind in this country, to each county of the State, exclusively for students desiring to take the agricultural course.

In national legislation the rural free delivery is a great step in the right direction, but it is yet in its infancy. It needs much encouragement and intelligent study to perfect its methods.

The pay of the carriers should be such as to insure the best and most painstaking service. It should be enough to induce educated and ambitious men, who will endeavor to improve and perfect the service, to compete for the positions. The rural carriers should be paid sufficient salaries to avoid the necessity of these good men being compelled to do an express and post-parcel business, and of being reduced almost to the level of hucksters and peddlers to enable them to make ends meet.

The Post-Office Department was never intended as a money-making institution, but is for the convenience of the people. All its machinery necessary should be used to make the delivery of mail in the country as nearly like the free delivery in the cities as possible. With this result accomplished we can go to our homes conscious of having done some little measure of justice to the most neglected of all our people.

But let us consider the question for a moment from a financial standpoint, though I contend that this solely is not a proper standard of measurement. Referring to the report of the Postmaster-General, we find that for six months—January and June of 1903, inclusive—the average monthly cancellation of postage stamps on each route was $11.22, and the average pay received by the carriers $49.78.

It is stated on good authority that the mail received by the patrons on these rural routes has been increased several hundred per cent since their establishment. Is it not reasonable to suppose that this tremendous increase in mail received is due, in large measure, to the establishment of the rural delivery system? And if due to this system, should it not be considered a part of the earning capacity of the system?

The total cancellation of stamps for mail collected on the rural routes during the period referred to, on 48,954,390 pieces, amounting to $949,048, or $11.22 per month for each carrier, is but a small part of their earnings, if you consider that 309,428,128 pieces were delivered by them in the rural districts during the same period—something like six times more than was delivered during a like period under the old system.

If the carriers receive credit for a just proportion of the cancellations on account of increased delivery, it can readily be seen that they are at least self-sustaining, if not a source of revenue. There is one other financial feature which we should bear in mind in passing. This increase of communication between country and town undoubtedly increases commercial transactions and results in profit to the towns. The cities and towns are well compensated for any tax paid for this purpose.

The good people living in the country deserve as much consideration at the hands of the Government as those who live in the towns and cities. Millions are voted annually for the improvement of rivers and harbors. Other millions are sought for ship subsidies and others for special fast mail trains between large cities. Why can not a reasonable amount be appropriated for the improvement of country life and in aid of scientific farming? [Applause.]

The country, where lives many of the best of our population, the great storehouse from which our cities must draw new blood, after the inevitable decline that comes to all overcrowded sections, should be made as attractive as the city. At least a portion of the wealth which now flows into the populous sections should be retained in the country by the intelligent and industrious farmers; and it should be the policy of the Government, within reasonable bounds, to use every effort to induce them to remain there in contentment.

Let us return specifically to the cause of the carriers. The city carriers are paid $1,000, $800, and $600, respectively, and where it is necessary they are furnished a conveyance, or $300 in lieu of a conveyance. They walk the streets of a well-paved city and are at no expense except for their own maintenance. It is seldom that he resigns; once the position is secured he grows gray in the service.

Mr. FINLEY. Or dies——

Mr. AIKEN. How is it with the rural carrier? He is paid only $600, and he is required to furnish his own horse, buggy, and harness at a cost of about $250 or $300 to start with. This outfit must necessarily be replaced with a new one at the end of three years. Those who are informed know that 17 miles a day the year around, or 25 miles every other day, is the full capacity of a good roadster, and when driven more than this a horse seldom lasts for more than two years. The carrier must pay out about $140 a year for horse feed, repairs to vehicles and harness, and shoeing horses.

It can be safely asserted that he must pay out as capital $300 per year, which leaves only $300 for his services and with which to maintain himself and family.

Contrast, if you please, the difficulties of his service with those of his fellow-carrier in the city. His round of 25 or 30 miles must be made every day, over roads often almost impassable. In sweltering August and freezing January he must trudge over the same dreary route, braving the danger of crossing swollen streams, meeting highwaymen, and numerous other possible attendant dangers. And for what? For the pitiful sum of $300.

But some will say that the people are anxious for the places even at this price. Granted that they are. It does not justify a parsimonious policy on the part of the Government, and, above all things, an unfair discrimination against him. There is no justice in this parsimonious treatment. We should provide more liberally for these overworked and underpaid public servants. [Applause.]

Is there any wonder that our rural carriers frequently resign? In South Carolina alone about seventy have resigned in the two or three years that the system has been in operation there, while in the United States something like 19 per cent of the whole number employed resigned in a single year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman in charge of the time to yield two more minutes to my colleague.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will yield the gentleman two more minutes.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Chairman, no employer on this floor cares to pay less for work than fair, living wages. Surely we ought not willingly take advantage of the extremity of the poorer carriers, who must work to support themselves and families, even if it is for a mere subsistence, when we are generally so liberal in our appropriations for public services, past and present.

The rural free delivery has long since passed the experimental stage; it has the approval of our best citizens, North and South, as no other public measure has. It is time we were beginning to look on it as a reality and give it adequate support, for in no other way are the people's taxes returned more directly to them.

As stated, my bill provides $900 per annum for the pay of each rural carrier. It is not graduated, for the reason that the greatest expense is incurred on entering the service; and even this amount will not put him on an equal footing with the city carrier. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] such time as may be necessary to conclude his remarks, not exceeding forty-seven minutes.

[Mr. FINLEY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have been astonished at the recklessness with which the Republicans, or at least certain gentlemen who have spoken for them, have undertaken to claim the credit for the inauguration of the system of rural free delivery of mails in this country. Some time ago I heard this claim put forward by the distinguished and able gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], but after he was confronted with the facts he did not press the contention. Two days ago, in an elaborate speech made by the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska, Judge NORRIS, the same claim was made. During his speech it developed that the great and good friend of ex-President Cleveland, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT], had formerly made a speech setting up the same contention, and yesterday the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BATES] arose to enforce that claim.

Mr. Chairman, there is absolutely no foundation in fact for this claim thus set up by the Republican party. It is a bold and bald-faced attempt to obtain goods under false pretenses. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] I believe this claim on the part of the Republican party was first put forward by First Assistant Postmaster-General Perry S. Heath, until recently secretary of the national Republican campaign committee, notwithstanding the fact that he had not emerged from the post-office scandals with a name as unsullied as "the Alpine snows thrice bleached by northern blasts."

As Mr. Heath rests under the strongly founded suspicion of being implicated in defrauding the Government whose interest he had taken an oath to protect, I was not surprised that he was willing to defraud an opposing political party of the credit to which it was entitled; but I must protest that his example should not be followed by honorable gentlemen upon this floor.

The facts of the case, Mr. Chairman, are that this reform, or more properly this expansion in our postal system, was conceived and pressed by Democratic brains, supported by Democratic Congresses, and inaugurated by a Democratic Administration. After it was once inaugurated and its merits demonstrated, it went on expanding by reason of its own merit, and it did not need the fostering care of any political party to develop it. The Republican party can not, therefore, claim the credit for the development of this purely Democratic idea.

To sustain the propositions I have laid down—first, that the rural free delivery of mails was conceived by Democratic brains; second, that it was pressed by Democratic statesmen; third, that it was supported by Democratic Congresses, and fourth, that it was inaugurated by a Democratic Administration—I desire to call attention to a few bits of recent history.

Mr. Chairman, the first suggestion made by any official of this Government upon the floor of Congress or in any Executive Department of the application of this system to this country was made upon the floor of this House on the 19th day of February, 1891, by Mr. Breckinridge, a Democratic Member from Kentucky. I read what Mr. Breckinridge said on that occasion in reference to this matter:

> I believe that the true reformation of our mail service is to be found in the adoption of some system by which, instead of having so many post-offices, we will have a delivery not only in the small cities but in the country. There is no earthly reason why a man may not start from one of our shire towns and travel in a circuit every day, delivering and taking up letters and papers, so that those who live in the country can have a daily mail.

That entirely and completely outlines the system of rural free delivery that we have to-day.

Mr. HARDWICK. The amendment proposed by Mr. Breckinridge was not adopted, however, was it?

Mr. FLOOD. It was not an amendment, but a speech.

Mr. HARDWICK. He did not offer an amendment?

Mr. FLOOD. No, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. He offered an idea.

Mr. FLOOD. In the discussion of the post-office appropriation bill Mr. Breckinridge suggested this idea, which was afterwards taken up by other Members of Congress, among them a constituent of my distinguished friend from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], and was so splendidly pressed to the fruition which we have to-day. That was the first suggestion which was ever made by any Government official of this idea as applied to this country.

The first bill that was presented to Congress on this subject was introduced in this House on the 5th of January, 1892, by Mr. Clarke, a Democrat from Alabama, and provided for the free collection and delivery of mails in rural districts. That bill, with others which followed it on the same line, was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads; and in May of that year that committee reported a bill to this House authorizing the Postmaster-General to make experiments in free delivery of mail matter in rural districts.

So in the Fifty-second Congress the Democratic Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads gave the system its imprimatur—the very first committee that did so in either branch of Congress. That bill was not acted upon, and on the 1st day of June, 1892, Mr. LIVINGSTON, a distinguished Democratic Member of this House from Georgia, offered the first amendment to a post-office supply bill providing for the inauguration of this system. His amendment provided that $100,000 be expended in experimental rural free mail delivery. That, with other amendments, was ruled out upon a point of order. But during the next session of the Fifty-second Congress, on the 17th day of February, 1893, upon the motion of Mr. Watson, who was then a Democratic Representative from Georgia, that Democratic House voted an appropriation of $10,000 for "experimental free delivery in rural communities other than towns and villages."

The Fifty-third Congress, Mr. Chairman, was Democratic in both branches, and at both sessions of that Congress similar appropriations of $10,000 were made.

The Fifty-fourth Congress was Republican in the House and Democratic in the Senate. The post-office bill as it went from this body omitted the appropriation of $10,000 which had been put on it for three successive years by Democratic Houses. It went to the Senate; and the Democratic Senate saved the system in its infancy from destruction at the hands of a Republican House by putting the appropriation for rural free delivery of mails in the bill and forcing the Republican House to accept this amendment.

Happily, Mr. Chairman, for the welfare of the people, the Democrats were in the majority at the other end of this Capitol, and they prevented the Republican majority of this House from strangling this infant Hercules in its cradle.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the gentleman whether it is not true that, notwithstanding the appropriation of $10,000 which, as the gentleman states, a Democratic Congress made, the then Postmaster-General, a Democrat, refused to put into operation the experimental routes provided for?

Mr. FLOOD. I will not evade this question as the gentleman from Nebraska evaded the one I asked him the other day, as to whether the House in the Fifty-fourth Congress did not fail to put this item in its appropriation bill. I will answer directly. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They did not do it. For three years, Mr. Chairman, the Democratic executive officers did not put this experiment into operation, for the reason that, as they alleged in every report which the gentleman from Nebraska read on Monday, the appropriation was not large enough to give a thorough, complete, and honest test to the system.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the gentleman, if that is true that that was not enough to give a fair and honest test to the system, then what credit can the gentleman claim for that Democratic House for giving a dishonest and niggardly amount? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FLOOD. The Democratic House kept on for three years making the appropriation, until it was large enough. The Democratic House had one idea as to the amount that was sufficient. The Democratic Post-Office officials, who may have been better informed, had another idea; but the Democratic House stood by this Democratic idea—this idea which was intended to benefit the agricultural masses of the people—until they appropriated money enough to give a fair and complete test to the system, and that test was given under Democratic auspices and resulted in the splendid system we have to-day.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we come on down to the time when, under these appropriations made by Democratic Congresses, the system had been thoroughly tested, had been approved by the people, and its popularity was known throughout the length and breadth of the land. We come to the Fifty-seventh Congress, when no party would have dared openly to fight the system.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman excuse me? Before the gentleman passes that I should like to call his attention to the fact that while William L. Wilson, of West Virginia, was Postmaster-General the experiments were tried, and the system was put in operation as fully as could be done with the money at the disposal of the Department.

Mr. FLOOD. I am coming to that.

Mr. NORRIS. That was in the fiscal year 1896-97.

Mr. FLOOD. In the Fifty-seventh Congress the Republican Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads undertook to deal a covert blow to this system, which would have utterly destroyed it. They brought in a bill here providing that these carriers should be selected, as star-route carriers are selected, from the lowest bidders. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] made an adverse report on that proposition, and when the matter was discussed here the Republican House saw that they could not fool the people and Mr. SWANSON'S ideas prevailed. And as in its infancy it had been rescued from the evil purposes of a Republican House by a Democratic Senate, so in its strength it was a Democratic statesman who prevented it from being seriously crippled, if not destroyed, by another Republican House.

I desire to read a portion of the report made by Mr. SWANSON upon that occasion:

RURAL FREE-DELIVERY SERVICE.

The undersigned, members of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, desire to dissent from the conclusions of the majority in regard to that portion of House bill 11728 which requires that the delivery and collection of mails and the performance of other postal duties on rural-delivery routes shall be let by contract to the lowest bidder.

In our judgment the adoption of that provision would change the whole character of the rural free-delivery service and deprive it of the elements which now render it most acceptable to the people and which have made it exceptionally successful even during its experimental stages.

We are satisfied that if the rural free-delivery service is continued on present lines it will greatly aid and facilitate the development of rural districts, make farm life more comfortable, increase the value of farm lands, and tend to prevent the further congestion of population in the large cities, which has become a peril to our institutions.

Being warmly in favor of the continuance and extension of rural free delivery, we can not agree to so radical a change, a change which we are satisfied would result in much injury to the service, if not in its practical destruction. The present system has been conceded to be a great success. This is shown by the phenomenal and constantly increasing demand for its continuance and extension. It therefore seems to us unwise in Congress to attempt so radical a departure, one which at best must be experimental and which might result disastrously. Those who are in favor of an efficient rural delivery should hesitate before venturing to take the step this bill proposes.

It should be noted that if the present status of the service is continued the Department will not be barred from offering the routes to those who will bid the lowest. We are satisfied that the Department will be willing to make experiments in different sections of the country to ascertain whether this contract system has in it the merits claimed for it by its advocates. We think it much wiser for Congress to wait until an experiment of the contract system has been made and practical results attained before making the system peremptory upon the Department. If this provision becomes a law, the Department will be compelled to follow the contract system even though it should find it to be very injurious to the rural-delivery service. All the reports of the Government officials show that the present rural-delivery system has attained marked success, and we see no reason at this time for so radical a reversal of policy as this bill calls for.

A carrier in the rural free-delivery system has to render service the success of which is dependent entirely upon his personal fitness. Under the present system a carrier is practically a traveling postmaster. He collects mail, he distributes mail, he registers letters, he sells stamps, he accepts money for the purchase of money orders. It therefore seems clear to us that there is as much reason for awarding post-offices to lowest bidders as there is for awarding the position of rural carrier, who is a traveling postmaster, to the lowest bidder.

The policy the Government has always pursued in the selection of employees requiring special personal fitness is to fix a specific salary and then try to get the best person for that salary. We can see no reason why there should be a departure in this respect in the selection of rural carriers. We do not see why rural carriers should be discriminated against—why a different ruling should be applied to them from that applied to all other employees in other branches of the postal service.

We are unable to understand the justice of subjecting this service to competitive bidding and not doing likewise to other branches of the postal service, where personal fitness is no more a requirement than it is in the rural service. We are unable to understand the justice of putting rural carriers, who perform more duties than city carriers, under the contract system and allowing the city carriers to continue under a salary. It would surely be far more sensible to arrange a contract scheme for the hundreds of letter carriers who simply act as collectors of the mail in the large cities and who perform no clerical work whatever. We are unwilling that the rural employee should be singled out for the contract system and that a discrimination should be made against the service which affects the residents of rural communities who contribute their share of the taxes and bear their portion of the burdens of the Government.

The reason urged for the difference of treatment to be given the city and the rural service is not tenable. It is claimed that a city carrier performs eight hours' work and hence it is possible to fix a specific compensation. It is urged that this is impossible in the rural-delivery service. We insist that it is perfectly practicable to establish routes requiring about eight hours' service of the rural carrier, and that his compensation can be fixed on short routes in proportion to the time it takes him to complete his work. Wherever it is found that it takes less than eight hours a day to do his work his route can be extended. After the system has been perfected there will be no difficulty in fixing upon practically a time basis, if desired, for the compensation of the carrier in the rural service. Then, too, it might be found advisable to fix compensation on a mileage basis. We think it wise, however, to leave the Department with full discretion in the handling of this question; we have full confidence in its ability to satisfactorily solve all problems that may arise. Under the present system the Department has this discretion; it is now exercising it, and we are satisfied that if the radical change proposed is not forced upon the Department, the further development of the present system to a higher degree of perfection will be certain. It should be remembered that this system is still being developed, and it would be the height of folly to hamper it, to stifle it with an untried scheme, which would tie the hands of the Department.

The contract system would attract persons least fitted to perform the duties of carrier—those who could afford to carry the mail for the least money. Persons of intelligence, energy, and good address, having finer business opportunities offered them, could not afford to work for as small a sum as those who are deficient in these qualifications so necessary for a successful carrier. It has been fully demonstrated in the star-route service that under competitive bidding the efficiency of the mail service has been injured by the character of those to whom the contracts were awarded. So general has been this complaint that the Department has been forced to make modifications in the manner of awarding contracts in the star-route service. The success of the star-route system with these changes is still equivocal. We are unwilling to change the present rural free-delivery service, which has been acceptable, and apply to it the star-route system, against which there has been so much complaint and dissatisfaction.

Besides, under the proposed contract system the contractor would feel under no obligations to perform any service except that which his contract plainly called for. A responsible contractor submitting a low bid would naturally and properly try to make all the money he could out of his contract. The cheapest cart, the poorest horse, the least service, the shortest cuts, would be his constant aim. A desire or effort to improve the service, to accommodate the people, to increase the business of the route would be the furthest from his thoughts. He would not encourage the use of the registry or money-order systems, because the registering of letters on route and the giving of receipts for money for the purchase of money orders would add to his time and would not be in keeping with the average contractor's motto: "The least possible service for the compensation received." On the other hand, a salaried carrier, feeling that he was an employee of the Government, anxious to retain his position, would be accommodating and endeavor to render all the service possible to his patrons. This difference of feeling and difference of interest between a contractor and a salaried carrier would make a vast difference in the success of the service.

Again, under the contract system, it would be difficult to get changes in established routes; every time a route was changed, increased or curtailed for the accommodation of the patrons or in the interest of good service, it would be necessary, under this bill, to relet the contract. The friends of the contractor, fearing that he would not be the lowest bidder under the reletting, would antagonize any change in the route for the accommodation of the people, or in the adjustment of established routes when new service would be added. Hence much difficulty would be encountered, and the systematic development and ultimate perfection of the service would be retarded. Under the present system extensions and changes are easily made and patrons are correspondingly accommodated. We are unwilling to put this serious obstacle in the way of accomplishing the development and perfection of this service.

The bill also leaves to the discretion of the Department the determining of the trustworthiness and character of the bidders. Whenever an unacceptable carrier would be the lowest bidder complaint would be lodged with the Department and interminable conflicts and scandals ensue. Every community would have dissensions over the worthiness or unworthiness of the various bidders, which they would seek to ventilate before the Department and insist upon the Department passing upon them. Every Representative in Congress would be besieged to take a hand one way or the other in these conflicts. The only escape the Department would have from such a deplorable system would be to strictly adhere to awarding a contract to the lowest bidder. It is easily seen that if this course should be pursued a very unacceptable and inefficient class of employees would be secured.

The bill also gives the Postmaster-General the power to reject any or all bids. This provision would be a standing inducement to political partisans in all sections of the country to bring all the pressure possible to bear on their Representatives in Congress to have the Department reject bids where their political friends had been unsuccessful, and if the power given in this provision should be exercised the service would become what it should not be—a political and partisan service.

The bill provides for no specified length of time for which a contract shall be awarded, and hence a contractor could not be given any assurance of permanent service or of a reasonable duration of contract. Under such circumstances no contractor would be willing to incur the expense of properly equipping himself for service which he might lose on short notice. A law or rule permitting a contractor to throw up the service on thirty days' notice to the Government would simply invite people to bid for the service who were temporarily out of employment and who would be willing to perform the service as a makeshift until they could secure other employment. In the winter months, during inclement weather, when the roads are bad and the work of delivering the mail is very disagreeable, there would be many abandonments of contract, and new contractors could not be secured except at exorbitant prices. This, too, would be at a time when the people are most interested in having the mails brought to their homes.

All through the early legislative history of this proposition the Democratic party has been its friend and the Republican party its enemy. Of course, Mr. Chairman, there were some Republicans who favored it. The distinguished gentleman from Iowa, Mr. Henderson, afterwards the Speaker of this House, was one of the conspicuous advocates of it, but the general trend of Republican sentiment was against it, and strongly against it.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the gentleman if $10,000 was not enough for an experiment; if it is not a fact that the first Congress that ever appropriated more than $10,000 at one time for this service was a Republican Congress?

Mr. FLOOD. Why, when they did that, Mr. Chairman, William L. Wilson had demonstrated the efficiency, usefulness, and popularity of the system, and the Republicans, getting on the band wagon, would have appropriated any amount for this popular expansion. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. NORRIS. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that when Mr. Wilson made the test we had a Republican Congress, and $40,000 was at the disposal of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. FLOOD. How did you get it? Ten thousand dollars was appropriated by the Democratic Congress in the Fifty-second Congress, $20,000 in the Fifty-third Congress——

Mr. NORRIS. I beg your pardon.

Mr. FLOOD. And $10,000 was forced from a Republican House by a Democratic Senate in the Fifty-fourth Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. NORRIS. That was made available for that year, making $40,000.

Mr. FLOOD. It may have been made available, but I have stated distinctly——

Mr. NORRIS. And it was made available by a Republican Congress.

Mr. FLOOD. That Congress was not Republican; only the House was Republican, and I have stated distinctly and correctly how and when these appropriations were made, and that but for the Democratic Senate the Republican House would never have made it available.

Now we come to the action of the executive branch of the Government upon this question under the Democratic Administration, the time when there was $40,000 in hand, a sum sufficient to give a fair test to the system, and when it was first inaugurated.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the gentleman another question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. FLOOD. No; not right now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FLOOD. In October, 1896, Postmaster-General William L. Wilson put his force of agents in the field to test this system thoroughly, honestly, and fairly.

I learn from a letter read here from Postmaster-General Payne that Mr. Wilson had had eighty-four routes investigated and ordered in between that time and the close of the Cleveland Administration. Now, Mr. Chairman, such a thorough test of it——

Mr. NORRIS. I do not believe the gentleman wants to mislead.

Mr. FLOOD. No, I do not.

Mr. NORRIS. That letter did not say prior to the going out of the Democratic Administration.

Mr. FLOOD. He ordered eighty-four routes in. They had been investigated, and he ordered them in. As his term expired on March 3, 1897, of course it was prior to that day they were ordered in. I know that from the letter of the present Postmaster-General, who belongs to the gentleman's own party, which was read here by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS] during his speech on Monday.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these routes were scattered all over this country, located at places that differed in population, in topography of the country, in classes of interest, and in the character of the highways, and so carefully was that test made, so thoroughly efficient was it, that the putting in of these eighty-four routes absolutely demonstrated the efficiency, the usefulness, and the popularity of the service.

With such a start there was no question as to the success of the movement, and it is clear that the Democratic party successfully introduced the system of free rural mail delivery before the inauguration of Mr. McKinley.

Let me sum up the facts:

First, Mr. Breckinridge, a Democrat, suggested the system.

Second, Mr. Clark, a Democrat, offered the first bill providing for its introduction.

Third, a Democratic Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads reported the first bill providing for its inauguration.

Fourth, Mr. LIVINGSTON, a Democrat, offered the first amendment to the post-office supply bill directing that the system be tested.

Fifth, Democratic Congresses made the first appropriation for this purpose, and Sixth, a Democratic Administration inaugurated the system.

With such explicit evidence on the subject accessible to them, it seems inexcusable that Republican speakers should attempt to appropriate for their party the credit of this system.

But the most reprehensible aspect of Republican speakers on this question is the charge that Postmaster-General W. L. Wilson, in reluctantly yielding to the demand of the country for the establishment of this service, deliberately located the routes at places where the service could not possibly prove satisfactory or of such a promising nature as to warrant a continuance of the experiment. In other words, that there was a deliberate and dishonest purpose on the part of Mr. Wilson and his Post-Office officials to use the money at his command—now swelled to $40,000—in a manner to defeat the system by not giving it the fair test desired by the people and intended by Congress.

Could political partisan effrontery go further? Did the eagerness for manufacturing political and campaign capital ever witness a more reckless indifference to the truth of history? Does anyone believe that William L. Wilson was capable of such deceit and dishonesty in the discharge of a public trust? Assuredly not. His most conspicuous and notable traits of character were the very opposite of this. Of all men he was open, frank, straightforward, and sincere in his expressions and methods. No devious or dishonest sentiment ever found an abode in his bosom. There could be no more flagrant instance of the extremity to which the rage of partisan triumph will carry its votaries than this most unfounded and brutal attack upon the character of a pure and upright man.

And if the facts involved in this discussion had been investigated before such statements were made, these unfounded assertions would not encumber the record.

Nearly all of the routes established by Postmaster-General Wilson are still in successful operation. The showing made by these routes is splendid, especially when you consider the fact that it was the very first experiment with the system in this country.

The wisdom and circumspection of the Democratic Administration in the selection of the best localities and routes is shown by responses to letters of inquiry sent out by Mr. Perry S. Heath in October, 1898, to the patrons of forty-four of the routes established by Mr. Wilson. This was two years after the tests had been started. In nearly every instance the answer was most favorable, commending the system, and thus demonstrating its popularity among the people. One of the notable exceptions, if indeed it was not the only one, was from Allensville, Todd County, Ky., and the principal complaint came from the postmaster at that point, whose objection was that the rural carriers were Democrats and not Republicans.

In nothing does the Federal Government come so immediately and so beneficially in contact with the individual citizen as in the postal service.

The cities and towns have long enjoyed the great boon of the free-delivery mail service; and now by means of rural free delivery the people of the country districts are being given a participation in it. Their letters, papers, and packages are delivered to them at their very doors, and at their very doors the carriers take their letters and packages and send them on their various destinations. The dwellers in remote sections thus have daily communication with the busy, bustling world. They feel, as it were, the very pulse of the business, political, and social events that are occurring in every portion of the civilized globe.

There was in the very nature of things a logical propriety that the system should originate with the Democratic party, since it is so distinctly a Democratic idea, operating peculiarly for the benefit of the people.

It is a great blessing to the farmers, especially in busy season. It brings the living, vibrating, tumultuous world to their very doors.

It has been truly said that an intelligent man in the most remote rural region, who takes magazines and papers and who has books of travel, with maps of illustration, may sit by his country fireside and travel around the world. The rural delivery of mail enables the inhabitants of these isolated sections of the country to take advantage of the method of education; it enables them to enter into the deliberations and doings of their National Congress and the State legislatures and to acquaint themselves with what is going on in the outside world.

The beneficent results of this Democratic idea are destined in the near future to be extended to our entire agricultural population.

And, Mr. Chairman, let me add that the time is not far distant when other Democratic ideas and doctrines as beneficent as this one, as broad in their application to the whole people, will sweep this country and will permanently hold it in their righteous embrace. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I now yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY.]

[Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield my time back to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TIRRELL].

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Chairman, in the time in which I shall occupy the attention of this committee I desire to address myself to two features contained in the Post-Office Committee's report. I say this with a full appreciation of the conscientious effort which has been made in the preparation of this report and the able manner in which it has been presented by the chairman before this body. One is the rural free-delivery service. It may indeed seem, after the able addresses which have been delivered, to be a matter of supererogation to spend further time upon the matter. My justification is the intense interest which is taken in the subject throughout the country. I do not propose to spend much time in demonstrating what has not been controverted so far upon the floor, that a salary even of $720 a year under the provisions of this bill is not an adequate compensation for the rural free-delivery carriers.

It has been shown, as was stated by the gentleman from Indiana a short time since, that every carrier, almost without exception, must keep at least two horses, and almost anyone in this body—everyone in this body—has sufficient knowledge of the expense of keeping two horses to be able to easily show, when you figure up the actual outlay which the carrier must make, that it leaves him only a portion of that sum, possibly about $400, and I think this a liberal estimate, with which to pay the expenses of his own support, an inadequate compensation by general consent of everyone conversant with the subject. Let me digress a moment to more fully explain.

I figure the expenses of the rural carrier's outfit as follows:

Support of his horses, $2 a week, or $4 for the two, amounting to $208 a year. This leaves, on the salary reported, $512. Shoeing I place at $40 a year; repairs of harnesses and wagons, at $30. Thus, without including incidental expenses, you have reduced that salary to $442.

But horses are liable to diseases or meet with accident or are worn out with usage, so that in a few years they must be replaced. One-third of that salary for one horse suitable for the service is then gone.

On the average in a term of years the compensation of the rural carrier is ridiculous, unless provision is made for earning a substantial sum in connection with his regular employment. This of course should not be permitted to interfere with his postal work, and is based upon the assumption that at present the expenses of maintaining this service is disproportionate to the revenue. It is to avoid a large deficit in the postal receipts created by this service.

It has been the custom in post-office administration to extend and perfect the postal service when receipts begin to equal the revenues. Postage has been reduced, pneumatic service installed, the money-order system extended, and in a thousand ways improvements made, resulting at first in a large deficit, but so stimulating the postal business that after a time the same process is repeated.

We can confidently assert that, great as the cost may be in the establishment of rural free delivery throughout the country, and great as the deficit may now be, a few years only will elapse before we shall witness such a growth in revenue that history will repeat itself and the Department substantially be paying its way again.

I am not advocating extravagant appropriations, but stating an historical fact in connection with this subject. It is a safe rule to follow to pay as you go. The justification of the present rule is claimed to be the inestimable educational influence created by postal facilities, the increase in receipts that follow, and the commercial and business advantages secured.

When rural free delivery was first introduced few anticipated so speedily its unprecedented growth.

The routes were first established about 1890, and down as late as 1897 there were only 44 routes in operation. In 1899 the service had grown to but 392. In 1900 they began with marvelous rapidity to spread over the country. Why such a demand and so unexpected a growth from that time on seemed almost inexplicable.

In 1902 there were 8,466 routes in operation. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, 6,653 were established, making a total of 15,119 on that date.

In 1897 $40,000 was appropriated for this service, while for 1903 the appropriation was $8,054,400.

Six thousand six hundred and fifty-three routes were established during the current year.

July 1, 1902, 11,726 petitions were pending, while on June 30, 1903, 11,700 petitions were on file awaiting action.

The present bill recommends for the pay of letter carriers and clerks in charge of substations of the rural free-delivery service $20,180,000.

The limited territory and dense population of my own State—Massachusetts—accounts in great part for the slow growth of this service there, the number of routes at the close of the fiscal year being 129. I know, however, that it is one of the most popular and best appreciated branches of the service.

During the year these routes showed the following business transactions: Registered letters, 2,032; letters, 866,266; postal cards, 195,748; newspapers, 1,216,899; circulars, 304,077; packages, 61,558, or a total of 2,647,250 pieces handled during the year.

Now, the committee have formulated a bill in which it is provided that a salary not exceeding $720 shall be given to a rural free-delivery carrier, but that he shall be debarred from engaging in any other avocation.

That is the rule, except there is added a proviso to which I de ire to call attention. That proviso says "That said carriers may carry merchandise for hire upon the request of patrons residing upon their respective routes." The first question which arises is, what is meant by merchandise? It can not include circulars or local papers or many things that will suggest themselves to your mind. That is a matter of interpretation as to what merchandise means. Then it says "upon the request of patrons residing upon their respective routes." That cuts the carrier out from conveying or transporting merchandise to anyone else. "Upon request of patrons." Does that mean a request made in each individual case? Does it mean a written or an oral request? Can that request be made for the entire year and for everything comprehended in this proviso? Then it goes on to say "whenever the same shall not interfere with the proper discharge of their official duty."

In other words, the Depar[t]ment is the arbiter as to what shall be carried, how long it shall be carried, and the nature of the article which the rural free-delivery carrier can carry under this proviso. There is no appeal from the decision of the Department on this question, because the last line is "under such regulations as the Postmaster-General may prescribe."

Now, I want to suppose a few cases and see where this may lead us. What shall be the weight of the merchandise which they are permitted to carry and transport for hire? Shall it weigh a half a pound, 2 pounds, or 3 pounds? What shall be the nature of it? It is indeterminate in this bill. How many packages will they be allowed to deliver, and under what terms and conditions? All is under the regulations of the Postmaster-General; and I claim that under the provisions of this bill they can practically exclude the rural free-delivery carrier from carrying anything because it says "in the proper discharge of their official duty," and it may be that these regulations will be such that they might not, in the judgment of the Post-Office Department, be able to transport any merchandise in the proper performance of the duties that are assigned them.

We can infer something as to what the rules and regulations will be under this provision if we know the attitude of the Department relative to this matter. That can be ascertained by referring to the report of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, as contained in the annual report of the Post-Office Department on page 623. There it says most emphatically that so far as soliciting for subscriptions for periodicals and newspapers is concerned the Department is irrevocably opposed to that because it leads to complaints from other newspapers covering the same territory, alleging that the carriers discriminate in favor of one paper against another.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TIRRELL. I will; but my time is getting very short.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Does the gentleman himself favor the allowing of carriers to solicit subscriptions for papers and flood the district they are serving with papers of their own choice? Does the gentleman believe in it?

Mr. TIRRELL. I do; I believe in it.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Now, the gentleman has no doubt given serious consideration to the matter, and I take it that in his district, as in mine, there are carriers of all political beliefs. Does the gentleman wish to have the rural free-delivery carrier in his district circulate Democratic papers to the exclusion of Republican papers?

Mr. TIRRELL. I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Because if there is objection to a Democratic paper in your district, there is objection to a Republican paper in the district of my friends on the other side. It is neither fair nor right.

Mr. TIRRELL. I will come to that in a moment. I desire to call the attention of Members to the attitude of the Department in regard to the express business. The Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General says in his report complaint is being made by express companies that there is an interference with their business; that in many cases the delivery of mail is a secondary matter to the express-package business, being regarded by the carrier as the more important part of his work; that if the carrier is to be allowed to still continue and engage in the business the star-route system which was condemned by the Fifty-seventh Congress should be restored. And then they wind up their conclusion, which demonstrates the attitude of the Post-Office Department, by saying:

> It is therefore recommended that rural carriers be restricted in the discharge of their official duty the same as city carriers, as prescribed by the Department, and to provide a compensation commensurate with the services performed the maximum salary should be raised to $750 per annum for a route of 25 miles.

Now, I want to ask the gentleman from Connecticut, in view of the attitude of the Department, if he does not believe that under the provisions of this proviso, through which, as General Butler used to say, you could drive a two-ox team, that the discretion and unlimited power given to the Department, if this bill passes without change, would absolutely prohibit the carriers from carrying any merchandise whatever?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not think so; I think the gentleman is absolutely mistaken.

Mr. TIRRELL. Now, let me ask the gentleman if he does not believe in the discretion and the information of the people at large? As to the local papers which these carriers alone solicit for the people upon their route, does not the gentleman think that the people know what they want? Are they so ignorant in the gentleman's district, or the section which he represents, that his people do not know what is contained in the local papers and what it is they themselves want?

And do you believe that any Democratic carrier or any Republican carrier is going to find anyone upon his route so stupid, so ignorant of the affairs of the country that he does not know the character of the paper which the rural free-delivery carrier is soliciting?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut rose.

Mr. TIRRELL. Oh, I can not give the gentleman any more time. I wish I had an hour in which to debate the question. I say that inasmuch as the dissemination of information by the greatest circulation of periodicals and newspapers is educational and must better the citizenship and bind together more indissolubly the people of the country, that I disagree entirely with the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]; and I believe that rural free-delivery carriers are doing a grand educational work in the spread of literature as they are spreading it now so rapidly all over the rural districts of the country.

As for the soliciting of subscriptions for periodicals, who can reasonably object to that? Is it not a benefit in a literary way? Does it not add greatly to the contentment and happiness of the home away from the social center?

The great periodicals of the country have been created by solicitation. Every imaginable scheme has been resorted to to add to their circulation. Millions have been spent in advertising. Prizes are temptingly offered to canvassers. All kinds of combination offers are held out to catch the unwary. No one complains. We applaud their enterprise. We know that the more they can circulate their publication the more information they are imparting among the people.

Nor need we mourn over any slothfulness of express companies who, in the keen competition of the day, watch eagerly for business openings and crush competition with a ruthless hand.

It looks to me like pretty small business when they are unable to take care of this part of the business themselves, that they should endeavor to prevent the rural carrier who can, or should deny the competition which they invoke to an equally worthy class of men.

I want now, Mr. Chairman, to address myself for a moment to the matter of this express-package business, and to see what there is in that. Do not we all know, can we be so ignorant of the fact that the express companies limit the delivery of their packages to the cities or towns where the population is segregated, and do not go but a very short distance beyond the main office? That is so throughout the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and I suppose it is also so throughout the country. If there is a package to be delivered beyond those limits, then word is sent through the mail or otherwise to the person to whom that package is delivered, and that person comes to the office, pays the charges, and gets the property.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, the system under which this business is now carried on by the rural carriers of the country is the delivery of packages beyond the limits of the express company's offices. They are for rural routes beginning, for instance, some distance from where the post-office is located, which is usually in the most thickly settled part of the town. In other words, you are giving millions of people in this country the benefit of the delivery of packages by express companies beyond the limit of the village or city which those companies cover. You are extending a beneficent system all over the land under the operation of the law as it now exists.

Now, I want to ask another question, and that is this: Can you find in this report, or has it been asserted here upon the floor of this House by any Member thereof that he knows a single instance in this country where the people for whom this law was enacted have complained of the existing order of things? Complaint is made, it is true, by the Department in this report, but how is it with the people? Have we not all been stormed by telegrams and letters from those interested—the patrons of these routes—and is anyone able to produce a single telegram or letter where the people who are benefited desire to have this privilege taken from them?

Therefore, I say, Mr. Chairman, because these things are wanted by the people, because it accommodates them in the transaction of their business, because it brings home to them great educational influence throughout the country, because it makes the resident of the country for all purposes except social a resident of the village or the city itself, I am in favor of the retention of the present system unless you can incorporate into the law a provision to pay a salary which shall be adequate for the rural free-delivery carriers, and as long as it is admitted here that such a salary is not provided for at $720 a year, then I say that under the system originally inaugurated and still recognized by this bill not to require the exclusive service of the rural carrier, while some relief is afforded, it is insufficient, and it will neither afford relief to him nor prevent the demoralization of the service by resignations during the current year. Some conception can be formed of what that will be when the facts appear.

Two thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine rural carriers resigned last year—19 per cent of the whole number; or, taking the total at the beginning of the year, 8,466, and the number enrolled at the end, 15,119, and averaging the same, 25 per cent of the whole.

The present arrangement, enabling the carrier, where it does not interfere with his governmental duties, to engage in business, was a tentative proposition, more or less experimental, designed to tide over the method of distributing the mail until the system was fully established and the expense of its maintenance known. Until a living wage is paid it must be continued to retain the carrier, as he can not live properly on $400 a year.

Reasonable compensation, with exclusive service for the rural carrier, can not be reckoned at less than $900 a year.

All the provisions in this bill restricting the rural carrier, in my judgment, should be eliminated and the regulations remain as now, with the salary fixed at $720 a year.

The second feature of the bill to which I call attention is the omission to provide compensation for seven assistant superintendents, salary and allowance division.

Noticing this omission, I went to headquarters to ascertain the cause. I assumed that it was on the recommendation of the Post-Office Department. I found that the object was to remove this division from the First to the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General's office, thereby consolidating with the fourth-class offices under his control the rentals, leases, clerks' hire, and other functions connected with Presidential offices.

The omission to provide compensation for these superintendents removes them from office and delegates their work to post-office inspectors, as was the case until some three years ago, when, at the request of the Post-Office officials, on account of the dissatisfaction and inconvenience attending the work by inspectors, the change was made.

I asked who would do the work hereafter. The answer was: "Inspectors—possibly some might be detailed to give their entire time to it."

I notice in the bill that five new inspectors are provided for, presumably to have a sufficient number to perform the work.

If inspectors are to be permanently detailed, why make any change at all? What will you have then but superintendents, to all intents and purposes? Is anything gained by abolishing one board to provide another modeled on the same lines? Will you advocate superseding the experts and able officials with experiments? If it is proper to have inspectors, and they do their work as formerly, the answer is: "They have been tried and discarded."

What does an ordinary inspector know about rental values? Inspectors are sent from one section of the country to another and are ignorant of local conditions. We have been suffering in eastern Massachusetts from an inundation of some of them from abroad. With honest intentions, no doubt, but ignorant of our localities and conditions, they have, along with much good work, caused infinite trouble in the correction of their errors. How much worse will it be when it comes to the application of their judgment to matters almost all of which require previous study, knowledge, and practical education?

What would an inspector from West Virginia or Kentucky or any other distant State know about real-estate values in the suburbs of Boston, on which side of the street the land value was greatest, and why or how to figure the rental value of post-offices already located or to be placed in a new building to be constructed, or on what basis to reckon, without a knowledge of construction, or how an office should be constructed from plans, the amount of space for clerical work and for patrons, the ingress or egress, and arrangements of the office itself, or what should be allowed for clerk hire, and how much help would be needed according to the business done and the office occupied?

No one but an expert is fitted for such duties. None but one who has, either as agent or owner, handled or appraised property or by employment made a specialty of this business, is fitted to do this work. Any other agent—call him inspector or what you will—can make leases and contracts but with men who can twist him around their fingers with the technical knowledge of the matter, and the Government thereby suffers.

Do you suppose an ordinary inspector, perhaps never a land-owner himself, or without experience, could properly perform the work that requires special preparation?

There are gentlemen here, appraisers of savings banks and experts in this line, who know better.

I know something of the valuable services some of these superintendents have rendered. They have been untiring in their zeal to protect the Government from imposition. They have acquired a detailed knowledge requisite to perform their duties. By study, by observation, by inquiry, by the intuitive perception which absorption in any business gives, they have become experts for the Government, which no imposition can deceive and no specious pleading can lead astray.

This change I have heard no call for. I believe that the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General should not have, in addition to the 70,000 fourth-class offices now in his control, this burden added, swelling the number of officials in his division in the postal service of the country to over 100,000 persons. It will so increase the multifariousness of work as to lead to the same complaints as caused originally the appointment of these men. It will result, I prophesy, in great losses to the Government and to some extent cripple the service, which on the whole is the admiration of the world.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address myself briefly to the same proposition that has been discussed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TIRRELL]. It seems to me that it is a phase of this bill which requires the serious consideration of every Member of this House. This bill proposes to increase the expenses of the Government by way of increasing the salary of the rural carriers to the extent of $120 per year. In very many instances it adds no benefit to the carrier himself. There are a great many cases, I am sure, where the carrier will be deprived by other provisions in this bill of more compensation than he receives by way of the increase provided for in the bill.

It has been said that there are now more than 18,000 rural carriers, and an increase of $120 per year increases the cost to the Government more than $2,000,000 in the operation of the free rural-delivery system; and in every instance where this provision in the bill takes from the carrier more than it gives him, it increases the cost to the Government that much, without giving any benefit—not one cent's worth—to the carrier or anybody else. But if in all cases the carrier can make it up to himself by having extended to him the privilege of delivering daily and weekly newspapers to the patrons along his route, to the amount of $120 per year, then these provisions in this bill simply extend and add to the cost of free rural delivery $2,000,000, without giving any benefit to anybody at all.

I object to it as a business proposition. I say there is no reason why the Government should incur this additional expense, and at the same time take away a few innocent harmless privileges which these carriers might have, by which they could increase their salaries to the extent of $100 or $120 per year and impose no additional expense at all on the Government.

I am not objecting to this increase of salary; I am in favor of it. I understand, and I think we all understand, that at a salary of $720 per year the rural carrier is more poorly paid than any other class of American labor in this great land. The railroad companies pay more to their men; mercantile firms pay more to their salesmen and their clerks; very few of the positions here in the Departments at Washington pay less than $60 per month; the mechanic makes from $2 to $4 per pay, and none of these people have a cent invested in the enterprises to which they contribute their labor. None of them are bound to maintain the cost of a team and a wagon and an outfit. When the rural carrier has paid the expense of his outfit he has at the end of the year less than any other class of American labor.

These men ought to be paid more; and certainly, when it harms no one, they ought not to be deprived of the privilege of delivering daily and weekly newspapers to patrons on their routes. This bill ought to be so amended as to give them the right to act as agents to take or collect subscriptions, and to deliver newspapers to their patrons directly from the printing office or from the express office or from the freight office—wherever the publisher may see fit to deliver them for local circulation. If the carriers were allowed this privilege, they could thereby acquire a few of the comforts of life. They could in a small measure increase their salaries. This would be a benefit to the rural carrier, a benefit to the farmers on the various routes, a benefit to the newspapers that might be represented by the carrier as their agent. It would be a benefit to all three of these classes of citizens; and

I beg any gentleman to say where it would do any harm—where, from the highest functionary of the Government down to the humblest citizen, any person would be wronged by giving the carrier this privilege of handling newspapers as the agent of the publishers.

It has been said that if this privilege should be granted it might deprive the Government of the revenue which it might otherwise obtain by having the publishers of newspapers send their papers through the post-office. I say, sir, that this Government ought not to undertake to compel the publishers of newspapers or any other class of citizens to patronize the postal system if they can transport their papers more cheaply through some other medium. On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, there are many instances where it is impossible for the daily newspapers to reach their destination through the mails for delivery on the day of publication. If they can be sent by express or by freight to the depot of the town from which the rural carrier starts, he can receive those papers direct and deliver them to the farmers on his route the same day. Inasmuch as this privilege will give benefit to all these three classes—the carrier, the farmer, and the newspaper publisher—and can do no harm to anyone anywhere at any time, I believe the bill ought to be amended so as to extend this privilege to the carrier. [Loud applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, the time for general debate on this side is, I believe, exhausted. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] will now dispose of the remainder.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has twenty-seven minutes.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield one minute to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY].

Mr. FINLEY. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and also to insert certain tables and documents.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday the Supreme Court of the United States decided the Northern Securities case. Immediately afterwards the Attorney-General of the United States was interviewed, and was careful to tell the country that the Government "would not run amuck" against all railroad combinations. Of course the Attorney-General would not have been interviewed unless he had wanted to be interviewed: nor would he have wanted to be interviewed unless he had some object in being interviewed and in sending that particular message to the country. This morning the New York Times comes out with an editorial headed "As to running amuck." This editorial is so felicitous a comment upon the situation, especially that part of it which seems to have called upon the Attorney-General to quiet the apprehensions of trusts and combines for fear they might think that the Government was going into the business of discovering and prosecuting them miscellaneously, without regard to political affiliations or connections with Republican policies, that I desire to have the Clerk read the article from the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the newspaper article in the time of the gentleman from Mississippi.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the New York Times.]

AS TO RUNNING AMUCK.

In his comment upon the Supreme Court decision in the Northern Securities case Attorney-General Knox said: "During the trial and argument the Government paid no heed to defendants' contention that the make-up of substantially all the great American systems of railroads was on trial. The Government's position then was that the question before the court was the validity of the Northern Securities device. Its invalidity is what the court has decided. The Government is claiming no more now in respect to this case than it did before the bar of the court. I say this much, not because it is necessary to give the country assurances that the Government does not mean to run amuck, but because of the historical character of that part of the defendants' case and some utterances that followed the decision of the court below."

And why, pray, does the Government now falter and draw back? The Government intends to enforce the law, does it not? If the President and the Attorney-General keep the obligation of their oaths to enforce the law they must forthwith begin proceedings that in their consequences will be quite indistinguishable from those of the act happily described by the Attorney-General as running amuck. The savage who runs amuck cuts and slashes on every side. That is exactly what the President and the Attorney-General must do. Scores, hundreds, perhaps thousands of corporations in this country are to-day doing business in open and flagrant violation of the law of Congress just applied in all its rigor by the Supreme Court.

The railroad systems controlled by the Rock Island, the Pennsylvania, the New York Central, and the New York, New Haven and Hartford companies are operated under agreements and consolidations which constitute in the several cases a "contract, combination in the form of a trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States," in defiance of the antitrust act. The violations of the law in these cases are as unmistakable as was the violation in the case of the Northern Securities Company. Have the people of the States within which these law-breaking railroad systems are operated no rights which the Government is bound to respect? Justice Harlan, in writing the opinion of the court, said that the forbidden restraints upon interstate commerce invade rights "which the public is entitled to have protected."

Are the rights of the people of the Dakotas, of Wyoming, of Montana, Idaho, Oregon, and Washington more sacred than the rights of the people of New York City, for instance, who can not travel north, south, east, or west without paying tribute to a transportation company carrying on its business in violation of the law of 1890? Is it because President Hill is more odious to the Administration than President Mellen that the one is smitten and the other goes scot free? Has the "Government" any special tenderness for Mr. Cassatt or for the Vanderbilts that it winks at their lawlessness while calling Mr. Hill and Mr. Morgan to stern account?

This will not do. Nothing but the most contemptible hypocrisy and cowardice can now restrain the Administration from letting loose all the dogs of war upon the guilty restrainers of trade. President Cleveland and President McKinley, innocent souls, did not know, for they had never measured either their powers or their duties under this law. The excuse of ignorance has been swept away from Mr. Roosevelt's Administration by his own acts, culminating in the authoritative declarations of the Supreme Court. Will his political friends advise him that an assault upon four-fifths of the railroad systems of the country would be a bad beginning for his campaign? They are evil counselors, Mr. President.

Your duty as President is a duty you owe to the public. Your campaign interests are wholly private. Justice Harlan said in his opinion that "the interests of private persons and corporations can not be made paramount to the interests of the general public." And again he declared "that the supremacy of the law is the foundation rock upon which our institutions rest." There is the mandate of the President and of the Attorney-General. They can not disobey, they can not refuse to heed, without running a risk of greater damage to their reputations than they ought to be willing to incur.

Standing by itself the suit against the Northern Securities Company, pressed with so much ardor, will pass for a theatrical campaign trick, a studied and carefully contrived device of the President to win the approval and the votes of the antimonopolists and the enemies of the corporations. That charge will be brought against him by every campaign speaker of the opposition. He can meet it, he can demonstrate his sincerity, he can prove that he has been actuated solely by a sense of public duty only by continuing with unflinching courage and unflagging zeal the work he has so triumphantly begun. Only when he can plant his feet upon the wreck of fifty great railroad corporations will his reputation as an honest, disinterested, and fearless Executive be secure. Does Theodore Roosevelt wish to have it said that he has succumbed to the threats or to the blandishments of Wall street?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the country will wait carefully to see whether this is "a mere theatrical campaign trick" or whether it is the beginning of a general policy of "shackling cunning" now, as we have in the past shackled force, according to a celebrated utterance of the President.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CALDWELL].

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I both trust and believe that this very important bill, reaching as it does every nook and corner in the nation, and affecting every person who sends or receives mail, will receive—as I believe it will—the careful consideration that it should. Carrying the enormous appropriation that it does, it is proper that it should be very carefully considered, and that every detail and every appropriation carried by it should receive the most careful and painstaking attention.

While, as I have stated, I consider this bill—taking into consideration the enormous appropriation that it carries—of the utmost consequence, I do not consider it the only very important measure that has received or that is to receive the consideration of this House or that should receive its consideration.

While I know that information as distributed by our immense postal system is one of the bulwarks of our institutions, I think the fact should not be lost sight of that in times past information and the distribution of knowledge were not alone needed for the preservation of our Government, but that physical energy and patriotic valor also were necessary.

When I speak of valor and energy in connection with the past history of this country, I allude to that valor and energy which, supplemented by the boundless patriotism that was possessed by the soldiers of this nation in the war of the rebellion, brought victory to our arms and saved the Union.

I have on more than one occasion this session listened to debate, frequently general in its nature, when the House had under consideration private pension bills. The tendency on these occasions has been to frequently criticise the Committee on Invalid Pensions on account of the large number of bills reported by it, while in a few instances some particular bill has been singled out with the intention of preventing its passage.

These attacks, I am pleased to say, as far as I am advised, have not resulted in any of the bills so attacked being unfavorably reported, the House on every occasion supporting the committee. In my opinion the Committee of this House on Invalid Pensions needs no defense other than the careful reading of its reports. They are uniformly carefully prepared documents, and always indicate in the conclusions reached and the recommendations made a degree of thoroughness not excelled by any other committee of this House.

The reports made by that committee to the House only show a part of its labor, because the claims that are unfavorably acted upon in committee require to be written up and require a part of the time of its members in their consideration, and still they do not appear on the Private Calendar of the House as evidencing the labor of the committee in that direction. This committee has not, to my knowledge, made a favorable report in a single instance when it should not have done so.

It has, in my opinion, in considering some claims, recommended too small an amount, thus showing that the members of it prefer to practice economy to making an excessive recommendation, though possibly moved to do so by sympathy for the old soldier.

I do not criticise this committee for not considering all the bills referred to it, but I commend it for its arduous labor in considering as many as it does.

If the Members of this House really desire all the pension bills they introduce considered, then let them favor increasing the membership of this committee to three times what it now is and direct the Bureau of Pensions to detail two more good men for duty there, and the thousands of bills referred to that committee can then be looked over and the meritorious ones selected and reported to this House. If a court of law was as much behind with its work as is this committee, would, or at least should, reasonable individuals desire its abolition? I think not. On the contrary, I think it would be desirable to so increase it in numbers that cases might be reached without unnecessary delay.

Does consuming the time of this House by reading reports and attacking certain bills mean opposition to granting or increasing pensions by special or private acts only, or does it mean opposition to granting pensions at all? I will not attempt to answer this question, because I am not prepared to say what the motives of anyone are, and sometimes it is, to say the least, embarrassing to call attention to such actions.

As a northern man and a Member of this House from the State of Illinois, at least one-half of whose quota of troops in the war of the rebellion were Democrats, and as a rugular Democrat and a fairly good party man, I desire to state most unequivocally and emphatically that I am in favor of liberal pensions, both by general and private legislation, for the soldiers of the war of the rebellion. Their valor and their patriotism helped to prevent the dismemberment of this Republic, and I favor liberal aid from a wealthy nation like ours to her defenders, now all old and many of them indigent and helpless.

We can, in my opinion, measure the life of this or any other nation by the patriotism of its people, and I know of no better way to keep that patriotism alive and vigorous than to keep the glorious achievements of our soldiers before the rising generation. If the youth of to-day sees the scarred and feeble soldier of the civil war in want, will it raise in him a desire to serve a country in war which thus neglects its defenders? And will it not tend to prevent the growth of patriotism? Nourish and cherish well that patriotism which makes us strong as a nation.

Treat the old soldiers so well that the young men will be anxious, in time of need, to attempt to do what they have done in the past. [Applause.]

While feeling thus toward the men who fought in the Union Army during the war of the rebellion, I have nothing but similar kindly feelings for the men who wore the gray in that conflict and who were defeated. They were as valiant a set of men as ever gallant soldiers met, and personally, if it were possible and if the fortunes of war permitted it, I would be pleased to treat them differently.

When the naval appropriation bill was before this House for consideration I favored its amendment to the extent that no larger amount should be carried than was carried by the bill for the present fiscal year. Had that been done and some other savings been made, we would have been in shape to have seriously considered at this session of Congress a service-pension bill, especially if we had taken into consideration the fact that the pension appropriation bill for the next fiscal year is many millions of dollars less than was appropriated for the same purpose a few years ago.

The increase in the naval appropriation bill for next year, as compared with the present year, amounting to fourteen or fifteen millions, if added to the difference between what we will pay out for pensions during the next year, as compared with what we paid out for the same purpose a few years ago, would, with judicious economy, give us enough to meet the increase resulting from the passage of a conservative service-pension bill.

Now, inasmuch as that was not done, should the friends of a service-pension bill fold their hands and quit trying? Of course not. There is no reason why we should quit trying. Allow me to say to my Republican friends that in my opinion the time has come to pass a service-pension bill. The old soldiers who made the dismemberment of the Union impossible in the sixties want you to pass such an act this session, and the people join with the old soldiers in demanding it.

While I desire to see an early adjournment of Congress, I am not in so much of a hurry to leave but what I would stay, if necessary, until the Fourth of July to pass a liberal and thoroughly considered service-pension bill.

Action in this direction has already been too long delayed. The boys of the civil war are now all old men. Had they been as slow in the sixties in responding to the call of their country as is Congress now in considering their petitions and giving them aid, the civil war might have had an entirely different termination.

Is the Republican majority in this House going to give Democrats who feel as I do a chance to help pass a measure of this kind? You are in the majority—it is up to you—and if such legislation is not enacted at this session of Congress the people of this country should know, and will know, why it was not done. I know that I voice the sentiments of a very large majority of the people of central Illinois, regardless of politics, when I say that they expect this Congress to pass a service-pension bill.

Will you of the majority allow those of the minority who feel as I do to help you pass it?

In behalf of the soldiers of this country I most earnestly request the Republican leaders of this House to at once submit for consideration a service-pension bill. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I now yield the remainder of the time, which I believe is about fourteen minutes, to my colleague, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] is recognized for fourteen minutes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We were informed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] in his speech in the House in 1902—March 13—that this mail-subsidy system was begun in 1877, and that this Southern subsidy was begun in 1893, and that gradually it has been entirely abandoned, or almost so. I believe only this Southern subsidy and one other, in Missouri, remains.

The minority report on this subject was prepared by my colleague, Judge MOON.

In this report he says:

> I object to paying these roads this large amount of money to induce them to do that which by law and good morals under the statutory contract they are bound to do—that is, to carry the mail with reasonable expedition. This subsidy was in part paid at one time to the road from Washington to New York, but it is now paid from Washington to New Orleans only, the first-mentioned roads declining to longer accept it, as I am informed. At any rate, there is no provision in the bill for the line between Washington and New York. The old reason given for this subsidy was that it was necessary to control and fix the schedule of a fast mail train from New York in business interests.
> This can not be done now, as the train starts from Washington and the Government does not control the New York connections. All of these claims are pure subterfuges to justify if possible the most unjustifiable section, in my opinion, ever openly incorporated in any decent bill. From the best information I can obtain the Kansas City donation is only a contribution to the railroad people for the indirect benefit of Kansas City newspapers. However this may be, it rests on the same pernicious policy that supports the Southern subsidy.

He further says:

> The section of the bill appropriating $142,000 for necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Washington to Atlanta and New Orleans, and $25,000 to Kansas City, Mo., and Newton, Kans., railroads, should be stricken out. * * *
> It is bad business policy to give a bonus to one or two roads and not to others doing the same work in the same time in as good or better manner.
>
> These two are the only subsidized roads in the United States, this vicious policy having been abandoned as to all other roads.
>
> These roads receive compensation for carrying the mail under the statutes just as the other roads do, and this compensation is full and adequate as to all roads. The extra amount provided for them in this bill is purely a gift.
> These roads do not furnish any facilities that many other roads do not furnish. They have a special train which carries the mail and express and on a part of the line passengers. Other roads do the same thing exactly.

Mr. Chairman, for eight years—since I became a Member of this House—I have opposed these mail subsidies; I oppose this to-day. It is unnecessary. The Post-Office Department does not ask for it. It interferes with making contracts to carry the mail with subsidized railroads. It is construed by the Post-Office Department as an order to spend the money, as Congress, over the protest of the Post-Office Department, will persist in making the appropriation when the Post-Office Department does not call for it. The money being appropriated, the railroads insist that it be paid them, and it is paid them regularly every year.

Mr. Chairman, I insist that we curtail these and other unnecessary expenses and use the money thus saved to raise the salary of the rural carriers as they should be raised, and can extend the rural delivery service into the jungles of the country where it is not now extended. I feel that in attempting to secure the defeat of the subsidy I am doing good service on behalf of the rural carriers and my duty by the Government and the people.

I will review as briefly as I can my recollections of the debates, based on official data.

I believe I can prove that this subsidy is not needed and that, as General Shallenberger, the officer having its use in charge, has said, it militates against the success of the mail contracts that he has to make with the unsubsidized railroads. For example, a railroad train is running 50 miles an hour on that road. One is running on another road over here 49 miles an hour, and we vote to give a subsidy to get that road to run its train 50 miles an hour. Then he goes back to this line here that is running without a subsidy 50 miles an hour and wants to make a contract to carry the mail with it. That railroad says: "Mr. Shallenberger, we are running 50 miles an hour. We want you to give us a subsidy." So that sort of embarrassment permeates his business in letting these contracts. He has said that he can get a better service or as good a service without the subsidy.

Mr. KLUTTZ. He did not say a better service.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am going to prove what I say. I am not going to state anything that I do not think is warranted by the evidence heretofore read in this House from post-office officials. Now, he says, or did say in substance, that if you take this subsidy out of the appropriation he will not be bothered when he goes to the unsubsidized railroads and undertakes to make a mail contract with them. So he deprecates this system.

Now, let me turn back to some of these debates and see if I can prove to you that that is true. I have not had the time to go to the report itself from which Members read in former debates. I will read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

A great deal has been said in the House for the past eight years about this question. There are quite a number of Democrats over here and some Republicans over there who have strenuously opposed it, and all the Democrats from Tennessee have opposed it. I want to say that the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, that gets a part of this subsidy, passes clear through my district in several ways. I believe the subsidy is not needed, and I am opposed to subsidies anyway. I put it upon both grounds, and either one would control me. And in addition to this I am trying to do what I think is right—get more money with which to extend our rural-delivery system.

During one of the debates on this subject in the House there was confusion as to what General Shallenberger's real opinion was on this subject. I went to his office and I said, "General, is this needed?" He said, and I will use one metaphor that he used, he said, "Mr. GAINES, when the tree was young it could not stand alone; we needed it, but we do not need it now. I am getting as good service without the subsidy as I am getting with the subsidy." That was when the bill was under discussion. This was a couple of days, as I recall it, before I made another inquiry of him.

Members were quoting him backward and forward, first one way and then the other, and finally to be sure that General Shallenberger had not changed his mind in the meantime, or that I had not misunderstood him, I walked out of this Hall and went to the telephone in the Speaker's lobby and asked him the question again, and walked back on the floor here to give this House—as I am now trying to do—the correct result of that conversation, as I was able to do.

On page 822 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 32, January 19, 1899, this occurred, just before we took a vote. I walked in and without securing the floor, because we were in the act of taking a vote, in order that I might get this information before the House, I said:

Mr. Chairman, I hope I may be allowed to say just one sentence. Since the beginning of this discussion I have telephoned General Shallenberger. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] Now, gentlemen, wait a minute and I think I will tell you something that you want to know. General Shallenberger says that when this subsidy business was started it was needed, but that it is not needed now, and he is getting as good service in some places where there is no subsidy as he is in others where there is a subsidy. [Applause.]

Then we took the vote immediately; and the vote to strike out or against the subsidy was—ayes 88, noes 42; and it was defeated in the House, went to the Senate, was put on in the Senate, and finally carried in the appropriation bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if you will turn to the debate in 1900 you will find that Mr. Moody, the present Secretary of the Navy, and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE], Mr. Bromwell, and a number of gentlemen quoted the testimony of the Postmaster-General along the line that corroborates what I said, and I am now trying to find the words used by Mr. Moody that substantially corroborates what I said. Here is what Mr. Moody said, on page 814:

That the same mail facilities can be obtained without the payment of this $170,000 as can be obtained with it.

He was then quoting a conversation he had with General Shallenberger, or quoting from the report. I will read the whole statement.

Mr. MOODY. I do not know whether I said the Postmaster-General—I am informed that I said the Post-Office Department: but I say that if the gentleman will go to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Shallenberger, he will be informed that it is the opinion of that gentleman charged with this special department of the postal service that the same mail facilities can be obtained without the payment of this $170,000 as can be obtained with it.

This substantially corroborates me if I needed it. General Shallenberger said substantially to Mr. Moody what he said to me. Such testimony as this is all through the debate at that time. We have had this question before the House until I am almost sick of it.

I say we are about to place in the hands of General Shallenberger a subsidy that, in his opinion, was in 1900 an embarrassment in making contracts for the expedition of the service with other roads, and, in fact, the subsidy heretofore used between Washington and New York is stopped. Why not stop this? Answer, gentlemen who favor this bald-faced gratuity to this railroad! Why not extend the rural delivery service and give the country people of this land the full benefit of the postal money that we were able to pay out for postal service?

Why give revenue, this tax money, to the railroads and anybody else, if you please, that do not need it? Why such gifts, and then balk about raising rural carrier's salaries and discuss postal deficits?

This subsidy is contrary to public policy. It conflicts with the officer in carrying out his duty, and I say it is absolutely inexcusable and wholly reprehensible. It acts as an order on the Post-Office Department to spend, and simply, as the officials say, because we appropriate it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, either General Shallenberger or the Postmaster-General says that, as you put this in the appropriation over his protest, without his recommendation, they take it "as a mandatory order that he shall spend it on the railroads."

Now, here is the RECORD. I will refer you to the volume, as my time is flying, and I can not read it. It is volume 33, part 5, along in pages 4718 and the following pages. Mr. Bromwell, of the Post-Office Committee, had the floor, and I quote from page 4728. He says:

Mr. Moody asked this question: "If this [appropriation] is under your discretion, Mr. Postmaster-General, why can not you discontinue it?"

Now, the Postmaster-General says:

So long as Congress appropriates for it, and so long as Congress authorizes me to expend the money, why, of course, I look upon it as an order to do so.

What does this do, gentlemen, but order the Post-Office Department to make it necessary in some way to spend this money, since it is ordered to do so?

Now, we had this question up here a year or two ago, when we had the testimony that the subsidized train got to New Orleans in just one minute longer time than the unsubsidized train—that is, that the unsubsidized train made one minute better time than the subsidized train. That is the way I recollect it.

We were subsidizing this train from New York to Washington, thence to New Orleans. I repeat, we have left out of the bill this New York-Washington subsidy. If you say that it was necessary to expedite the mails, I ask how are we going to enable the Postmaster-General by a subsidy to expedite the mail from New York to New Orleans when in the meantime we have cut off the subsidy that used to exist for the train between New York and Washington? Answer, if you will, gentlemen; I repeat, answer.

Now, I can not go all over this subject, because it is familiar to every Member of Congress who has been here since the Fifty-fifth Congress. Why, the chief champion of this is my delightful friend—or one of the great champions—is my good friend from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. Now, you may look along through the testimony in here and you will find where he himself says:

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Shallenberger has stated that he thinks the general mail service would be better performed if we did not make these special appropriations.

But with his keen intellect the gentleman from Virginia insisted, in reply to this, that this subsidy did improve this particular service. To that I reply the "general service." All over the United States must suffer for this special or particular service. Is that right? Is that wise?

In further reply to this argument I submit that it was also in proof a year or two ago that one of these Atlantic seacoast lines down here was subsidized to carry the mail and they gave it up and refused to accept the subsidy, yet the official proof stated this road continued their trains on the same schedule without the subsidy as they did when they had the subsidy. So will this road. This subsidy is not necessary, gentlemen.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes, with pleasure.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to know if it is not a fact that in some of the previous presentations of this matter it has not been shown that some of these roads running from New York south, receiving part of this subsidy, had trains that did not carry the mail which ran as fast or faster than the one subsidized.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why, that is my recollection, and I have no desire, nor has my distinguished friend from Kentucky, to purposely misstate a fact in regard to anything. As I have stated before, my recollection is a subsidized train running to New Orleans took one minute more to get there than an unsubsidized train.

Mr. FLOOD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. I understand that the difference in the schedule time is that the subsidized train gets there at 11 o'clock a. m., whereas otherwise it would get there at 8 o'clock p. m. Is that the fact?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, what they are doing now. Heretofore I worked at this matter as hard as I ever worked at anything in my life to get at the bottom of it, and when I worked it out and stated it on the floor of the House it was not successfully disputed but that the unsubsidized train got to New Orleans in one minute shorter time than the subsidized train. That is my recollection. And this Atlantic Coast Line kept up its schedule after it gave up this subsidy, just as it did while it was paid a subsidy.

Mr. KLUTTZ. How long ago was that, and is that the case now?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Since I have been in Congress. The RECORD will show.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman let me read just two lines from this report?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I have not any control of the situation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. By way of extending my remarks I submit the following memoranda:

On April 26, 1900, this question was under discussion, and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE] made the following quotation from the testimony of the Postmaster-General on this subject:

In submitting the estimates for several years past this office has declined to include the item for special facilities for the reason heretofore stated, but appropriation has, however, been made.

The appropriations were made, although not requested.

This question was asked the Postmaster-General, said Judge LITTLE:

Is not the tendency where they give subsidies to one line for others to ask or expect the same kind of pay?

The Postmaster-General, said Judge LITTLE, replied:

The tendency is to produce discontent and dissatisfaction, if not hesitancy, on part of the other roads in giving us similar service without special appropriation.

I am reading now from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 26, 1900, page 4718, from the speech of my friend from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE], who used these quotations in his speech of that day:

Mr. DAVIS. It [the pending bill] says it is not necessary for him [Postmaster-General] to use this money; that the Postmaster-General is not compelled to use it or any part of it "unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interests of the postal service."

The gentleman from Arkansas replied:

Mr. LITTLE. Yes, I will answer that.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Postmaster-General does not regard it as necessary he would not use it. If he does regard it as necessary to give these people this fast mail he ought to use it.

Mr. LITTLE. There is nothing in that argument. It has been repeated here time and time over in face of the declaration of the officers of the Department when they had refused to recommend this appropriation, and Congress goes on and makes the appropriation anyhow; they felt that it was mandatory upon them; that it was an expression of Congress that "we want this money expended, whether you think it necessary or not."

Here is the language of the Department, and I commend it to the consideration of my distinguished friends. It was the answer of the Postmaster-General, and this very question was covered: "Well, the Department would have power to withhold it, but having recommended to Congress the advisability of withholding it, the Department is bound to assume that Congress desires the appropriation to be expended as long as it is made."

I have not time and have not had it to go and get the original Post-Office records, but no one disputes the correctness of this official testimony.

Turn over, now, to page 4721 of the same RECORD (April 26, 1900), and you will find where the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] read a part of the minority report on the cause of deficits in the postal service, as follows:

CAUSE OF POSTAL DEFICITS.

We are satisfied that the main cause of the deficiency of the revenues in the Post-Office Department is largely due to the cost of transportation allowed and paid the railroad companies on inland mails. The report then says the railroads get the best terms they can from the Government to perform this service. * * * We pay an average, as shown by the Postmaster-General's report, for carrying the mails of 8 cents per pound.

The best estimate to be made from the proof on the hearings on this question is that the actual expense to the transportation company in carrying the mails is about 1 cent per pound, and that the express companies (which we are informed pay about 40 per cent of their earnings to railroad companies for hauling their cars) underbid the Government on second-class mail matter, and carry it at less than 1 cent per pound on hauls of less than 500 miles and still make a profit.

Then follows a table in the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi with the following heading: "Facts of grossly excessive pay to railroads for hauling United States mails," which, among other things, states:

	Per cent.
Decline in freight rates since 1878	35
Decline in passenger rates since 1878	17½
Decline in mail rates since 1878	Nothing.

Turn over to page 4724 and you will find the speech of the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Bromwell, then on the Postal Committee, in which he says:

In the report of the Postmaster-General for the last year, and the language is substantially the same in every report running back for ten years, he said: "In submitting the estimates for several years past this Office has declined to include the item of special privileges for reasons heretofore stated, but appropriations, however, have been made."

The gentleman from Ohio then says:

The Assistant Postmaster-General, in reply to that very question, put to him by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Moody], as stated in the general debate the other day, says:

"Although on its face it appears to be a discretionary power, yet when Congress, after full debate year after year, has put this provision in the bill and made this appropriation, the Post-Office authorities can not construe it otherwise than as indicating the wish of Congress that it shall be spent and have understood it as mandatory."

Now, turn to the next page and you will find that the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, which runs through my city, Nashville, is a beneficiary of this subsidy.

On page 4727 following you will find that the gentleman from Ohio quotes the question asked by Mr. Moody of the Postmaster-General, to wit:

If this is in your discretion, Mr. Postmaster-General, why can not you discontinue it?

And the Postmaster-General answered:

So long as Congress appropriated for it, and so long as Congress authorize me to expend the money, why of course we look upon it as an order to do so.

Now, Mr. Chairman, isn't it monstrous that Congress should, over a protest of the Department for reasons of public policy and because we are getting as good service without it as with it, that we should again make this appropriation and again "order" this money to be spent needlessly when we can use it otherwise beneficially to foster and encourage the rural-delivery system?

If we save our nickels we will soon have dollars, and thousands and thousands of them if we save nickels that belong to the Government whenever we can.

On the same page—4727—of the RECORD of April 26, 1900, we find this motion to strike out this appropriation:

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out that paragraph last read. The paragraph was to appropriate $171,238.75. It was lost by a vote—ayes 41, noes 92.

This is the language of the paragraph:

For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from New York and Washington to Atlanta and New Orleans, $171,238.75: Provided, That no part of the appropriation made by this paragraph shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service.

Mr. Chairman, with such a history as this coming from the Department, as it does, it is a shame and an outrage that Congress will sit here and place the money in the hands of a Post-Office officer to spend, when he does not, in his judgment, need or want it for this service. And yet we find it is spent annually.

Is it not an invitation for the railroads thus benefited to demand, to practically "hold up" this officer, whom, we see, yields annually to the expenditure of this money whether the public service requires it or not? Who is the judge here?

Let us take away the temptation to throw away money, or this temptation to railroads or anyone else, directly or indirectly, to compel an officer to do what in his judgment is contrary to public needs and the healthy administration of our public service. Let us use it where we know we need it or keep it in the Treasury.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOUTELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the post-office appropriation bill and had come to no resolution thereon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of House Document No. 598, submitting an estimate of appropriation for shooting galleries, ranges, etc., at Fort Des Moines, Iowa, and the same was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. KINKAID, for ten days, commencing the 15th instant, on account of important business.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference reports contained on page 3269 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Mr. Speaker, there are sixteen of these cases, and they have all been considered by the House, and the Senate recedes in nearly all the cases, and I do not think it is necessary——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Has the conference report been printed and laid over for twenty-four hours?

Mr. GIBSON. Yes; forty-eight hours; and I would ask, Mr.

Speaker, that they be agreed to in gross. I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks perhaps the safer way would be to report each conference report at least by title.

ORIGINAL PAPERS USED AS EVIDENCE.

Mr. LAMAR of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10007) to authorize the Commissioner of the General Land Office to transmit original papers to be used as evidence.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the register of any United States land office shall be served with a subpœna duces tecum or other valid legal process requiring him to produce, in any United States court or in any court of record of any State, the original application for entry of public lands or the final proof of residence and cultivation or any other original papers on file in the General Land Office of the United States on which a patent to land has been issued or which furnish the basis for such patent, it shall be the duty of such register to at once notify the Commissioner of the General Land Office of the service of such process, specifying the particular papers he is required to produce, and upon receipt of such notice from any register of a United States land office the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall at once transmit to such register the original papers specified in such notice, and which such register is required to produce, and to attach to such papers a certificate, under seal of his office, properly authenticating them as the original papers upon which patent was issued; and such papers so authenticated shall be received in evidence in all courts of the United States and in the several State courts of the States of the Union.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

At the end of said bill add the following proviso:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall make rules and regulations to secure the return of such documents to the General Land Office, after use in evidence, without cost to the United States."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question, whether this requires the production of any papers not on record in the Land Office? For instance, suppose these original papers were sent on and should be lost in the mail. What I want to get at is whether there are original records in the office still that could be produced afterwards to fortify the title.

Mr. LAMAR of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I am not informed as to that, as to whether there is a record made of these papers or not.

Mr. PAYNE. It seems to me there ought to be on file in the office either a record or a copy certified by the Commissioner, so as to preserve the evidence in favor of the grantee in case these papers should be lost.

Mr. LAMAR of Missouri. Here is what the Commissioner of the General Land Office says as to that proposition:

The purpose of this bill is to provide a method by which the original application and other papers on file in the General Land Office, and which form the basis upon which patents have been issued, may be brought into court to be used in evidence and inspected, and which provides that when the register of any local land office has been served by subpœna duces tecum or other process to produce such papers in any court of record, such papers shall be transmitted to him by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and shall be by such register produced in court and, after being used in evidence, by him returned to the General Land Office, the party requiring the production of such papers to pay the cost thereof.

The necessity for this legislation arises from the fact that in many localities a large number of forged deeds, purporting to be signed by the original patentees of lands, are being placed on record, and quite an amount of litigation growing out of such forgeries and affecting land titles is now and has been pending in the courts, and such forgeries, in many instances, can only be shown by an inspection of the original application and final proof on file in the land office having the signature of the entryman thereon. As the law now stands no method exists by which litigants can secure these original papers as evidence. This bill provides a method by which these papers may be used in evidence in such cases, and at the same time it is believed proper safeguards are provided against their loss.

Attention is invited to the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office approving this bill, hereto attached and made part of this report, also letter of the Secretary of the Interior concurring therein.

Mr. PAYNE. Then the title would not be invalidated if these papers should be lost. I have no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have some explanation of the reason for the passage of this bill. It seems rather remarkable.

Mr. LAMAR of Missouri. I would say to the gentleman that the purpose of the bill is to allow the production of these papers where forged deeds have been placed on record. The reason for the introduction of the bill is that in my section of Missouri hundreds of forged deeds have been placed on record. The people there have procured certified copies and have tried in every way to show a forgery. The purpose of this is to get the production in court of the original applications and the papers bearing the original signatures of the patentees in order that these forgeries may, if possible, be shown—at least to give to litigants every possible opportunity to expose the forgeries. That is the only and the sole purpose. Consultation was had with the authorities at the Land Office before the bill was drawn, and a bill has been drawn in conformity with their suggestion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LAMAR, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS ON POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that under the general debate on the post-office appropriation bill Members may have leave for five days to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi objects.

DISPOSAL OF TIMBER ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5054) to provide for the disposal of timber on public lands chiefly valuable for timber, and for other purposes, to report it favorably with an amendment and to submit a report thereon. It being a bill that comes from the Committee on Public Lands unanimously, I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota, from the Committee on Public Lands, asks that the bill reported by him may be now considered. The bill will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Interior to sell to the highest bidder, at public outcry or otherwise, under such rules and regulations and subject to such conditions and restrictions and in such quantities as he may prescribe, the right to cut and remove, within such period of time as he may fix, any timber from any unappropriated, nonmineral, surveyed public lands, after first having had such timber duly appraised and after giving public notice of the time, terms, manner, and place of such sale.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior shall have power and authority to reject any and all bids offered at any such sale; and that it shall be unlawful for any purchaser at such sale to sell, transfer, assign, or in any manner alienate the rights secured by him under this act, except as authorized by said Secretary.

SEC. 3. That the act entitled "An act for the sale of timber lands in the States of California, Oregon, Nevada, and in Washington Territory," approved June 3, 1878, and all acts amendatory thereof, be, and the same are hereby, repealed, and no lands valuable chiefly for timber shall hereafter be patented under the commutation provisions of the homestead laws.

SEC. 4. That any person who violates or attempts to violate any of the provisions of this act, or any regulation or requirement prescribed pursuant thereto, shall forfeit to the United States all benefits conferred by this act and all moneys paid by him thereunder; and any right to cut and remove timber thereunder which he may then hold shall be canceled and revoked.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to add the following as a new section:

SEC. 5. That all moneys received from the sale and disposal of the rights to cut and remove timber on public lands in Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Kansas, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Dakota, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming, as provided in section 1 of this act, shall be, and the same are hereby, reserved, set aside, appropriated, and constituted a part of the reclamation fund created by the act entitled "An act appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States and Territories to the construction of irrigation works for the reclamation of arid lands," approved June 17, 1902, to be used and expended as provided by that act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I move that Senate bill 370, Senate bill 932, and Senate bill 4916, relating to the same subject, be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to; and the following bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 370) providing for the disposal of timber and stone on public lands chiefly valuable for timber or stone, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 932) to repeal the act providing for the sale of timber and stone lands, the desert-land act, and the commutation provision of the homestead act; and

A bill (S. 4916) to provide for the disposal of timber on public lands, and for other purposes.

LAND PATENTS IN BITTER ROOT VALLEY, MONTANA.

Mr. GIBSON. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6787) to confirm and validate patents to certain lands situated in the Bitter Root Valley, State of Montana, above the mouth of the Lo Lo Fork of the Bitter Root River, to report it favorably without amendment. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The bill was read; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that all patents heretofore issued for lands in the Bitter Root Valley, State of Montana, above the mouth of the Lo Lo Fork of the Bitter Root River, designated in the act of June 5, 1872, in desert entries, preemption entries, mining entries, entries under the act of June 3, 1878, as extended to all the public-land States by the act of August 4, 1892, commonly known as the "timber and stone law," and for lands selected for the benefit of the University of the State of Montana prior to the passage of the act of August 3, 1894, are confirmed and the patents validated, to all intents and purposes, the same as if the law under which the patents were issued was applicable to those lands.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time and passed.

ADDITIONAL HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

Mr. DUBOIS. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3165) amending section 3 of the act of June 5, 1900, to report it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and to submit a report thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported by the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That any person who has heretofore made, or who may hereafter make, entry under the homestead laws, but who shall show to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office that he was unable to perfect the entry on account of some unavoidable complication of his personal or business affairs, or on account of an honest mistake as to the character of the land; that he made a bona fide effort to comply with the homestead law, and that he did not relinquish his entry or abandon his claim for a consideration, shall be entitled to the benefit of the homestead laws as though such former entry had not been made.

SEC. 2. That any homestead settler who has heretofore entered, or may hereafter enter, less than one-quarter section of land may enter other and additional land lying contiguous to the original entry which shall not, with the land first entered and occupied, exceed in the aggregate 160 acres, with-ant proof of residence upon and cultivation of the additional entry; and if final proof of settlement and cultivation has been made for the original entry when the additional entry is made, then the patent shall issue without further proof: Provided, That this section shall not apply to or for the benefit of any person who does not own and occupy the lands covered by the original entry: And provided, That if the original entry should fail for any reason prior to patent, or should appear to be illegal or fraudulent, the additional entry shall not be permitted, or, if having been initiated, shall be canceled.

SEC. 3. That commutation under the provisions of section 2301 of the Revised Statutes shall not be allowed of an entry made under this act.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I should like to have the author of the bill explain what change it proposes to make in the present law?

Mr. DUBOIS. As the report shows, this bill merely condenses the present law, and in a case where the homesteader has made a homestead entry which he has been compelled, through no fault of his own, to relinquish and for the relinquishment of which he has received no consideration—all of which must be proven to the satisfaction of the Department—it proposes to enable the homesteader to make another homestead entry.

Mr. WARREN. As I understand, this bill merely reinstates right already invested in homesteaders who have failed utterly to obtain the right under some claim which they have relinquished and for which they have received no consideration?

Mr. DUBOIS. The bill is carefully guarded, it providing that the failure of the homesteader was through no fault or neglect of his own.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill providing for second and additional homestead entries, and for other purposes."

GLEN HAVEN CHANNEL, WISCONSIN.

Mr. KEAN. I am instructed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred a resolution submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], to report it favorably with amendments. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. SPOONER December 17, 1903:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce is instructed to investigate and report, at the earliest practicable day, whether the Government work in the Mississippi River, the boundary line between the States of Wisconsin and Iowa, opposite the county of Grant, in the State of Wisconsin, so far as constructed, or if the same shall be completed as planned, will close or render unnavigable the Glen Haven channel, along the Wisconsin shore, which has been navigable for rafts and steamboats for over forty years.

Resolved, That said committee is authorized to conduct said investigation by full committee or a subcommittee, and shall have power to send for persons and papers, examine witnesses under oath, employ a stenographer, and sit during the sessions of the Senate, at such times and places as the committee may determine; and the actual and necessary expenses of said investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

The amendments reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate were, in line 2, after the word "report," to strike out "at the earliest practicable day;" and in line 9, after the word "steamboats," to strike out "for over forty years" and insert "how long said channel has been so navigable, whether in the public interest such channel should be closed, and also whether said river at said point is susceptible of improvement so as to secure adequate navigable channels on both the Iowa and Wisconsin sides thereof;" so as to read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce is instructed to investigate and report whether the Government work in the Mississippi River, the boundary line between the States of Wisconsin and Iowa, opposite the county of Grant, in the State of Wisconsin, so far as constructed, or if the same shall be completed as planned, will close or render unnavigable the Glen Haven channel, along the Wisconsin shore, which has been navigable for rafts and steamboats; how long said channel has been so navigable, whether in the public interest such channel should be closed, and also whether said river at said point is susceptible of improvement so as to secure adequate navigable channels on both the Iowa and Wisconsin sides thereof, etc.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I wish to express the hope that the Committee on Commerce, who are to make this investigation, will summon to their aid the engineer officers of the Government who have charge of this improvement.

Mr. SPOONER. I have not the slightest objection to their doing that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

SABINE LAKE CHANNEL, TEXAS.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] reported favorably this morning from the Committee on Commerce the bill (H. R. 3565) directing the Secretary of War to expend $125,000, heretofore appropriated, for a channel through Sabine Lake, Texas. As it is a short bill, and there is some urgency about it, I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill reported this morning, which will be read to the Senate for its information, subject to objection.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to use and expend the $125,000 appropriated by an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1902, for the purpose of improving mouths of Sabine and Neches rivers, Texas, in accordance with House Document No. 249, Fifty-fourth Congress, second session, by connecting the same with Sabine Pass by a channel 8 feet deep through Sabine Lake, in excavating and constructing a channel 8 or more feet deep from the mouths of the Sabine and Neches rivers, at or near the west shore of Sabine Lake, to Taylors Bayou, a navigable stream in the State of Texas.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALLEN V. REED.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill (S. 2540) authorizing the appointment of Allen V. Reed, now a captain on the retired list of the Navy, as a rear-admiral on the retired list of the Navy. I will say that this bill was heretofore read and went over under an objection, which has been withdrawn.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BERNARD W. MURRAY

Mr. FOSTER of Washington. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2113) for the relief of Bernard W. Murray.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him, which has been reported by the Committee on Claims with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment reported by the Committee on Claims, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50 per month for sixty months to Bernard W. Murray: Provided, That should the said Bernard W. Murray die before the expiration of sixty months leaving no minor children said payments shall thereupon cease. Should the said Bernard W. Murray die before the expiration of sixty months leaving minor children said payments shall cease upon the majority of the youngest of said children.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KEAN. If there be a report in that case, Mr. President, I should like to have it read. It seems to be rather an extraordinary case, in which it is proposed to pay the sum of "$50 per month for sixty months."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. FULTON on the 3d instant, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to which was referred Senate bill 2113, having considered the same, recommends the following amendment, and so amended that said bill be passed:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute therefor the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50 per month for sixty months to Bernard W. Murray: Provided, That should the said Bernard W. Murray die before the expiration of sixty months leaving no minor children said payments shall thereupon cease. Should the said Bernard W. Murray die before the expiration of sixty months leaving minor children said payment shall cease upon the majority of the youngest of said children."

The facts upon which the foregoing claim is based are as follows:

The claimant, Bernard W. Murray, was on January 8, 1901, appointed overseer of the engineering department at large, and sent to Fort Flagler. His duties as overseer required his presence at all times on the works, and while engaged in that capacity, on the 14th day of August, 1901, he met with an accident, the facts concerning which are quite fully set forth in a letter from Mr. R. H. Ober, superintendent, of which the following is a copy:

FORT FLAGLER, WASH., January 22, 1902.

DEAR SIR: Referring to your letter of the 9th instant, relative to accident to Bernard W. Murray, overseer, on August 14, 1901, I have the honor to submit the following report of the circumstances of the accident, with outline sketch showing the arrangement of the plant for mixing concrete at the mortar battery, Fort Flagler:

The sand, gravel, and cement are stored in the bunkers shown at "B" on sketch. Along on a side of the bunkers and below the level of the floor runs a car for measuring the sand and gravel. The sand and gravel run from the bunkers through openings in the side into the car.

The proper proportions of sand, gravel, and cement are placed on the car by two men, who then push the car to position over a second car, shown at "C." A swinging door in the bottom of the measuring car is then opened and the charge of sand, gravel, and cement falls into car "C." The weight of this charge is about 3 tons. Signal is then given the engineer, who is stationed at the hoisting drum "D," by means of a push button "E," operating an electric gong at the engineer's station. The engineer then starts the hoisting drum, on which is wound a five-eighths-inch steel cable passing over a sheave at the top of the incline, thence over a sheave on the front end of the car "C," and then back to the upper end of the incline, where it is fastened. The position of the engineer is such that he can not see the car "C" until it is nearly at the top of the incline, on account of the mixer building and trestle intervening. On arrival at the top of the incline, over the concrete mixer, the car automatically dumps the charge and returns by gravity to the foot of the incline.

On the morning of August 14 work of mixing and laying concrete was begun at 8 a. m. The measuring car at the bunkers was operated by Henry Barter and Aug. Riedel, laborers. The car "C" was operated by Arthur L. Jones as engineer, on signals given by Henry Barter. One charge of materials was hauled to the top of the tramway, the materials dumped into the hopper below, and the car returned to the foot of the tramway. It was observed by Mr. Murray that the car did not run down to quite its proper position for receiving the charge from the measuring car, and he asked Barter if the bearings of the car wheels and the sheave had been oiled that morning. Barter replied in the negative. Mr. Murray obtained an oil can, it is supposed from the other end of the bunkers, and returned to the car with it.

In the meantime Barter and Riedel had pushed the car into position under the measuring car and had dropped the charge into it. Telling them not to give the signal to the engineer until he got through oiling the car, Mr. Murray went down on the track in front of the car and began oiling the sheave. Barter and Riedel stood on the platform behind the measuring car. From the position they occupied it was impossible for them see Mr. Murray. While Mr. Murray was at work below Barter pushed the button and gave the signal to the engineer to start the car. As soon as this started Mr. Murray was caught by the cable and wheels of the car in such a way as to fracture the left arm, dislocate one of the vertebræ of the spinal column, and severely bruise the left leg near the hip. Hearing Mr. Murray cry out as the car started, Barter immediately gave the signal to stop and back the car. This was obeyed by the engineer, who stopped the car at a point about 16 feet from the starting point and let the car back, leaving Mr. Murray lying on the track. There were no eyewitnesses of the accident, and it is not clear as to the exact manner in which he was caught by the cable and wheels, but it seems to be certain that the car wheels did not pass over him. The accident happened at about 8.15 a. m.

Barter was immediately discharged. His address is care of St. James Hotel, Seattle, Wash. Aug. Riedel quit on September 9 to go to Seattle. Arthur L. Jones quit on November 16. His address is box 42, Station A, Minneapolis, Minn.

It was Mr. Murray's duty to see that everything connected with the concrete plant was in good running order.

Respectfully, yours,

R. H. OBER,
Superintendent.

Maj. JOHN MILLIS,
Corps of Engineers, United States Army, Seattle, Wash.

The nature and character of his injuries are set forth in the following statements:

"I, Jacob C. House, being duly sworn, depose and say that I have for fourteen years practiced medicine in the city of Port Townsend, county of Jefferson, and State of Washington, being a regular practitioner under the laws of the State of Washington; that I am well acquainted with Bernard W. Murray; that on the 14th day of August, 1901, I was called in consultation with Doctor Truax, United States Army surgeon at Fort Flagler, in regard to the condition and treatment of said Bernard W. Murray; that said Murray had received severe injuries while underneath a truck car arranging its mechanism, when it was suddenly started, causing a fracture of the left humerus near its middle, a severe contusion of the left hip extending over the lower abdomen, also an injury to the lower dorsal and lumbar spine; that on or about August 21, 1901, I was again called in consultation in the same case for the reason that the injury to the spine was causing severe pain and there was motor paralysis of the lower limbs; that after this consultation and consulting with the son of Bernard W. Murray we decided to send him to the Providence Hospital, at the city of Seattle, where he could receive better nursing. Doctor Truax accompanied him there and placed him in charge of Dr. George M. Horton, of that city.

"Notary Public in and for the State of Washington,
"Residing at Port Townsend.

"To whom it may concern: This is to certify that Mr. B. W. Murray was under my care, confined in Providence Hospital, from September 1, 1901, to the latter part of October of the same year, suffering from an injury which he received at Fort Flagler, at which time he was unable to move himself without assistance, having received a severe injury in the region of his back. My bill for attending Mr. Murray during that time is $75, no part of which has been paid. I further certify that Mr. Murray called upon me October 20, 1903, at my office, still walking with crutches and in a very much crippled condition, and at this time is far from being an able-bodied man, if he ever will be such again.

The Chief of Engineers, to whom the bill was referred, reported thereon as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, February 18, 1904.

SIR: I have the honor to return Senate bill 2113, Fifty-eighth Congress, first session, for the relief of Bernard W. Murray, late overseer of construction at Fort Flagler, Wash.

From a report of Maj. John Millis, Corps of Engineers, dated January 23, 1902, it appears that Mr. Murray was injured while oiling the bearings of a car used for transporting concrete materials at the concrete-mixing plant at Fort Flagler, another employee giving the starting signal while Mr. Murray was down on the track in front of the car. His injuries, as reported at the time, consisted of a fracture of the left arm, a dislocation of one of the vertebræ of the spinal column, and a severely bruised left leg near the hip. A detailed history of the accident will be found in the accompanying copy of a report from R. H. Ober, superintendent.

It is believed that Mr. Murray is entitled to compensation for the injuries he sustained, but I am unable to say whether the amount provided for in the above-mentioned bill is excessive or merely an equitable amount.

Copies of papers on file in the office concerning the case are herewith.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. MACKENZIE,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers, U. S. Army.

HON. WM. H. TAFT,
Secretary of War.

Mr. KEAN. I never heard of such a bill having been heretofore passed by the Senate. It seems extraordinary, and I object to the present consideration of the bill, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be returned to the Calendar.

AIDS TO NAVIGATION IN DELAWARE BAY AND RIVER.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3905) to establish aids to navigation in Delaware Bay and River.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, authorized to provide for the establishing of the following aids to navigation in Delaware Bay and River, at a cost not to exceed $635,000; and for that purpose the sum of $250,000 is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, said aids to be established in the order in which they are named.

Brown Shoal, Delaware: For establishing a light-house and fog signal on Brown Shoal, Delaware.

Miah Maull Shoal, New Jersey: For establishing a light-house and fog signal on Miah Maull Shoal, New Jersey.

Elbow of Cross Ledge, New Jersey: For establishing a light-house and fog signal on the Elbow of Cross Ledge, New Jersey.

Joe Flogger Shoal, Delaware: For establishing a light-house and fog signal on Joe Flogger Shoal, Delaware.

Arnold Point Shoal, New Jersey: For establishing a light-house and fog signal on Arnold Point Shoal, New Jersey.

Goose Island Flats, New Jersey: For establishing a light-house and fog signal on Goose Island Flats, New Jersey.

Old Mans Point, New Jersey: For establishing range lights on Old Mans Point, New Jersey.

Seventeen Foot Knoll and Marcus Hook, Delaware: For establishing range lights on Seventeen Foot Knoll and Marcus Hook, Delaware.

Horseshoe Shoal, Pennsylvania: For establishing a light-house and fog signal on Horseshoe Shoal, Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not rise for the purpose of objecting to the bill, but I want to ask the Chair if this subject has not always been within the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department until the Department of Commerce and Labor was established?

Mr. PENROSE. I understand, Mr. President, that that Bureau has been transferred from the Treasury Department to the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator does not understand my question. I am only asking for information from the Chair, although it is not a parliamentary inquiry——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not understand the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. I wanted to know if the Light-House Board has ever been within the jurisdiction of the War Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It never has, within the knowledge of the Chair, been under the jurisdiction of the War Department, but it has been always under the charge of the Treasury Department until recently, when by law it was transferred to the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. SPOONER. It occurred to me, as the War Department has charge of all improvements of rivers and harbors, of the navigation of which this is an essential part——

Mr. BERRY. These are light-houses.

Mr. SPOONER. I know they are light-houses; but the bill relates to aids to navigation——

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me, if I understand the organization of the Light-House Board, it embraces an officer of the War Department and an officer of the Navy, who together are secretaries of the Board, and who are supposed to be acquainted with the needs of navigation and other needs connected with the harbor defenses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH CABLE COMPANY.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1362) for the relief of the Postal Telegraph Cable Company. It is a very short bill, favorably reported some time ago from the Committee on Claims, and it is important that it should be passed as early as possible.

The bill was read; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. The preamble recites that whereas the Postal Telegraph Cable Company rendered telegraph service to the Post-Office Department from July 1, 1889, to June 30, 1893, during which period the bills of the company were properly rendered with a protest against the rate fixed by the Postmaster-General attached, and the same was disallowed and returned with the vouchers owing to the accompanying protest; and whereas the rate fixed by the Postmaster-General was subsequently declared illegal by the United States Court of Claims and the protest filed with the bills sustained. Pending the decision of the Court of Claims sufficient time elapsed as to place this claim beyond the jurisdiction of that court; therefore, the bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to pay to the Postal Telegraph Cable Company, a corporation incorporated under the laws of the State of New York, having its principal office at No. 253 Broadway, New York City, $2,155.19, for telegraph service rendered to the Post-Office Department from July 1, 1889, to June 30, 1893.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

HENRY E. RHOADES.

Mr. FORAKER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PLATT of New York. Will the Senator from Ohio withhold his motion for a moment that I may ask for the consideration of a bill?

Mr. FORAKER. I will withhold the motion for that purpose.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I ask for the consideration of the bill (S. 2164) for the relief of Henry E. Rhoades, assistant engineer, United States Navy, retired.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of the Navy to transfer Assistant Engineer Henry E. Rhoades, upon the retired list of the United States Navy, from the half-pay list to the 75 per cent pay list of retired officers, under section 1588 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to take effect from the date of his retirement.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN T. WERTZ AND WALTER H. SHUPE.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. MILLARD. With the consent of the Senator from Ohio, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 2284) for the relief of John T. Wertz and Walter H. Shupe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield for that purpose?

Mr. FORAKER. I yield, but I wish to give notice that I can not yield further. I understand that this is a very short bill and that it will take no time.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to repay to John T. Wertz and Walter H. Shupe the amount of purchase money furnished by them, respectively, not exceeding $800 in all, for the purpose of making coal entry No. 43, Helena, Mont., of the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section 4, township 13 north, range 19 west, Helena meridian, Montana, February 26, 1887, in the name of Rudolph Boehm, which entry was canceled by the Commissioner of the General Land Office September 5, 1894.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE WHITING VIEW COMPANY.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator desires me to yield for what purpose?

Mr. McLAURIN. Simply to have a letter read which is a short page. On last Saturday I read a letter to the Commercial-Appeal, of Memphis, from Mr. Paxton.

Mr. FORAKER. I yield in order that the letter may be read.

Mr. McLAURIN. I have since that time received a letter from the Whiting View Company, and I think in justice to them it ought to be put into the RECORD for whatever it is worth. That is all I ask to have done. I think they have a right to have their side of the question heard, after the reading of the letter which referred to them. I do not wish to do anybody injustice. Somebody or some company printed the obscene pictures sold to negroes but not exhibited to white people. This company denies that it printed them. Their denial and statement are in this their letter. Put into the RECORD, it will go for what it is worth, with the letter of Mr. Paxton and the confession of this company's agents that they were selling obscene pictures, printed by somebody, too bad to exhibit to white people.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the following letter may be read. Is there objection to the reading of the letter?

Mr. ALDRICH. What is the subject?

Mr. FORAKER. I understand that it is from the Whiting View Company.

Mr. McLAURIN. I will state that the Whiting View Company was mentioned in a letter to the Commercial-Appeal by Mr. Paxton, which I read to the Senate a few days ago. They feel aggrieved at what was said by me, and want to have what they claim to be a wrong to them righted. I feel that they have a right to have their answer to what was said put into the RECORD for whatever it is worth. In justice to them I think it ought to go into the RECORD; and I ask that it may be read, so that it may go in to-day's RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE WHITING VIEW COMPANY,
Cincinnati, Ohio, March 14, 1904.

Hon. A. J. McLAURIN,
United States Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

HONORED SIR: We write you with reference to the matter you referred to in the United States Senate on Saturday; i. e., the charge made against us by the authorities of Indianola and Leland, Miss., for selling photographs that they claimed were improper for distribution. Our agents have been and are now at work in almost every quarter of this country, and have been for years in not only America, but in foreign countries as well, and yet this is the first charge we have ever had to meet. We strive to make our views of an educational character, and think we have succeeded very well, as our views can be found in many institutions of learning and are recommended by educators everywhere.

Our works consist principally of things of great national interest or of such things or places as have any historical significance in all parts of the known world. We have only a very few photographs of famous paintings, which you will find listed on page 15 of the catalogue we are sending you herewith. They were made for the exceptionally educated person who really admires art work of this class, and never had we any thought of these finding their way into the hands of negroes, who would handle these beautiful things in the light of the ridiculous or ludicrous. Never did we entertain such a thought as placing anything before the public that might in any way be taken to mean that the negro and the white people were on an equality. How could we do such a thing? We have mothers and wives that are Caucasians and we could not do anything that would cause them to blush. No; there has been a great mistake, and we appeal to you to use your influence in making what is wrong right. We can do no more.

We remain, sincerely,

THE WHITING VIEW COMPANY,
Per R. R. WHITING, Manager.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I suppose this is for the purpose of a general widening of the street.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes; and it has the approval of the Supervising Architect and the Secretary of the Treasury.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourn on Friday next it adjourn to meet on Monday, March 21.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourn on Friday next it adjourn to meet on Monday next. Is there objection?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I will not object to this request, but I wish to state to the House that in view of the information that I have that such a motion if made to-morrow will not only be in order but will probably prevail, it might be better to wait until to-morrow. However, I have no objection to the request being granted, although I am very anxious that the bill which is before the House shall be concluded as early as possible.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

HOLDING OF COURTS AT ATHENS, GA.

HARRY HALLER.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 6582) granting an increase of pension to Harry Haller; and as both the report and statement have already been printed in the RECORD, I ask that only the statement be read.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the Clerk will read only the statement.

The report of the committee of conference was adopted.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. OVERSTREET, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. BOUTELL in the chair) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 13521, the post-office appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate on this bill being exhausted, the Clerk will begin the reading of the bill by paragraphs for debate and amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

For advertising, $5,000.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I think it highly important, especially after the fact has been demonstrated that we have a whole lot of rascals in the Post-Office Department, that the chairman of the Post-Office Committee should tell us what this sum of $5,000 is for; and I might say to him that probably we may now be a little more particular than we have ever been in trying to find out what these appropriations are for and how they are to be expended.

Mr. OVERSTREET. For the past five years, including the present fiscal year, there has been appropriated for this particular item the sum of $7,000. The bill now before the committee recommends a reduction of that appropriation by $2,000, appropriating $5,000 instead of $7,000. This item is for advertising, separately, and I may say almost exclusively, in the supply divisions of the Department.

Mr. MADDOX. Is there any rule or regulation by which this money is spent, or is that matter left in the discretion of the officers of the Department?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The expenditure must be passed upon by the Auditor and must be in accordance with the laws which usually prevail in regard to advertising. The expenditures are shown by vouchers covering the specific matters.

Mr. MADDOX. I suppose all this clerk hire, etc., is also passed upon by the Auditor?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mostly; and the expenditures are authorized by law; otherwise they would not be made.

Mr. MADDOX. Do they furnish any bills of particulars as to what they advertise for?

Mr. OVERSTREET. They advertise for bids in connection with the purchase of all supplies in the various branches of the Department, but this is principally used for the supply division of the First Assistant's department. Those advertisements are published in newspapers in such a manner as to encourage bids in locations where the articles are to be purchased and to invite proper competition in regard to furnishing the various items of supplies.

Mr. THAYER. I should like the attention of the chairman of the committee for a moment. I understand that in this case there was an application from the Department for $7,000, but the committee reduced the appropriation to $5,000. I should like to ascertain what confidence can be placed in a Department when it asks for $7,000 in a case where the committee think it proper to give only $5,000.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The estimate was for $7,000. The committee based their recommendation of $5,000 on the expenditures as shown for the last two or three years, during which they did not in any one year reach $5,000. We therefore felt that that amount would be an ample appropriation.

Mr. THAYER. Had they some new scheme for advertising other things than the committee thought proper, or did the Department happen to ask for $7,000 when in reality, according to past history in the Department, it needed only $5,000?

Mr. OVERSTREET. There was no "new scheme" suggested, and the money which has been appropriated in previous years in excess of $5,000 was not expended, but was covered into the Treasury. The committee thought that instead of making a liberal appropriation, with the confident belief that a part of it would be covered back into the Treasury at the end of the year, it would be better to appropriate substantially the amount which would probably be expended.

Mr. THAYER. I am entirely in accord with the conclusion to which the committee came. What I wanted to know was whether a Department is not open to some criticism when it asks for $7,000, when it has expended only $5,000 in years past and no new scheme is proposed for greater expenditure in the ensuing year; in short, when it asks for $2,000 that is not needed.

Mr. OVERSTREET. There are no facts presented to the committee that would indicate there would be occasion of criticism of that estimate. It was the usual appropriation which had been made for a number of years, five years at least, and the unexpended balance of that item of appropriation was at the end of the respective fiscal years covered into the Treasury.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of line 8.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 8 insert "to be used in supply department only."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That will limit the way in which the appropriation can be used, and I think it should have some limitation.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, there is no need of crippling the service in the effort to economize. There are more articles for purchase of supplies than appears in this specific department. For instance, the Dead-Letter Office have matters that pertain to that department, and there are miscellaneous items which can not be covered by specific designation in each item of appropriation. I think that when the House fixes a reasonable amount for the purpose of meeting the class of expenditure for advertising purposes, advertisements which are specifically intended as a stimulus for competition in bids, that it is answering every purpose. I think the gentleman himself, upon reflection, would appreciate that a limitation specifically to the supply department would necessitate another item for advertising purposes where there were bids which ought to be invited for miscellaneous items and items not covered by this specific item of the supply department.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There is no restriction whatever. It simply says "for advertising."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Exactly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And it could be used in connection with any advertising of the Post-Office Department, whether necessary or not. I think there ought to be some limitation attached to this bill.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman will remember, at a later point in the bill the committee recommends consolidating all the supply divisions, and that would enable a closer scrutiny, not only of the purchase of supplies, but it would create economy in the administration of that expenditure, possibly; but that would be done, and later the appropriations could be segregated and the items of expenditures might admit of a lesser amount of appropriation for advertising for the supply department.

But under the present administration I think the gentleman will appreciate that where we are making a reduction in the item solely for advertising purposes, the limitation of holding all that advertising for supplies, thereby excluding certain miscellaneous items of proper expenditure in the different divisions in the Department, it would operate to embarrass the administration of the service.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Would you admit a limitation that it apply to advertising under the present postal laws?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think that would not be necessary.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think there ought to be some limitation.

Mr. OVERSTREET. A limitation is made when we provide it must be for advertising purposes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I ask for a vote on my amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Division, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, is it too late for me to ask that the amendment be reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 19, noes 37.

So the amendment was rejected

The Clerk read as follows:

For miscellaneous items in the office of the Postmaster-General, $2,000.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know what these miscellaneous items are.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, there has been carried in the annual post-office appropriation bills for practically all the years since the creation of that service an item for miscellaneous expenditures in the office of the Postmaster-General. That item for all of the years named until the last year was $1,000. It was intended to cover the little items which might arise in the administration of the head office of that great Department which were peculiarly incident to it and his personal expenses, which were entirely for the service. There has been a very small amount of the appropriation expended from year to year. It covers his personal expenses when he goes away on Department and official business. It does not cover any other expenses of a personal character. It takes into account the little incidentals of the office; and last year, the year of 1903, there was expended out of that item only $331.96; the preceding year, that of 1902, there was expended $980.13. I will say, for the information of the committee, that vouchers are taken for these expenditures and they are passed upon by the Auditor, who has the authority under the law to refuse to pass an account from this expenditure which is directly incident to the office, not the person, but the office of the Postmaster-General for incidental items of this miscellaneous character.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do.

Mr. BURLESON. If less than $1,000 has been heretofore expended under this item in the bill, why should we increase it to $2,000?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The committee did it for this reason: There is carried in each of the Assistant Postmaster-Generals' offices an item for miscellaneous expenses of $1,000. That has been the law for many years. The committee felt that, inasmuch as the expenditures from these miscellaneous items in the several offices named were limited in amount, have never been entirely expended, and were intended primarily, definitely, and certainly for the miscellaneous items of the office over which the Postmaster-General or one of his four assistants had control, we could well afford to give the Postmaster-General's office $2,000 for those miscellaneous items if each of the assistants had $1,000.

I will say that in none of these departments is there absolute need of the appropriation, but gentlemen will appreciate that in the administration of a great Department like the Post-Office Department there may at times arise necessities for incurring small expenditures incident entirely to the particular office, appropriations for which expenditures are not covered by the general appropriation items.

Mr. MADDOX. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this $2,000 item now proposes to cover the miscellaneous expenditures for the other departments?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No; I stated that each of the Assistant Postmaster-Generals had an item for miscellaneous expenditures in his respective department of $1,000, and to the Postmaster-General we gave $2,000 for the reason that we felt it was at least as important——

Mr. MADDOX. You do state, though, as I understand you, that under this item the Postmaster-General has never expended even $1,000.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, that is quite true; and whatever is unexpended, as shown by the vouchers passed upon by the Auditor, under the law is covered into the Treasury at the end of the year. It is a little leeway in the careful and proper administration of his office.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BURLESON. The amendment is to strike out the word "two," in line 10, and insert the word "one." For my life, I can not see why, if the Post-Office Department has heretofore expended less than $1,000 under this item, it should now be increased to $2,000. In the light of recent developments it would be only an encouragement, I will not say of extravagance, but of practices that are more reprehensible in the Post-Office Department, and for this reason I insist, Mr. Chairman, that the proper thing to do is to strike out the word "two" and insert the word "one."

Mr. COWHERD. Mr Chairman, if there is one item in this bill that this side of the House ought not to object to, it is that item of $2,000. Of course I do not think it will make any difference in the management of the office or in the amount of money expended whether it is made one thousand or two thousand dollars; but gentlemen will remember that that item was made $6,000 last year for the specific purpose, as stated in the letter of Mr. Loud attached to the Bristow investigation, that the Postmaster-General might have a fund at his disposal to aid in furtherance of that investigation and discovery of the trouble and the crimes committed in the postal service. Now we did not feel like reducing that too far this year; because if he should show any disposition to employ people for that purpose, we wanted him to have the funds on hand, and I think this side of the House, at least, should not insist on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation and expenses of United States delegate to the Universal Postal Congress, to convene at Rome, Italy, $7,500.

Mr. CROMER. Mr. Chairman, an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 2, page 2, after the word "Italy," the words "seven thousand five hundred" and insert in lieu thereof the words "five thousand."

Mr. CROMER. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the allowance heretofore made for this purpose has been $5,000. At this time, when the spirit of economy has taken hold of the Post-Office Committee, I can not see why this item should be increased to seventy-five hundred dollars. Twenty-five hundred dollars will increase the salaries of ten rural carriers from $600 to $850. I think that if we practice a little economy in the several items of this bill we can pay the rural carriers in this country a sufficient salary to justify them to remain in the service. I am told that the purpose of increasing this item in this bill is that it is the intention of the Post-Office Department to send on this mission a former Member of this House, whose voice has always been raised in the interest of economy, and I know that if he thought such were the intention of the Department he would not sanction this increase in this appropriation.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is this congress to be held at the same place as the others?

Mr. CROMER. Well, this congress is to be held at Rome. They are held in various parts of the world at different times.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. CROMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURKETT. This says "a delegate." Was it in the last bill the same way?

Mr. CROMER. Yes.

Mr. BURKETT. I thought we always had three delegates heretofore?

Mr. CROMER. No; there is only one in the last bill.

Mr. BURKETT. But that is the same as this, as I understand it. We have always had three at all these postal congresses in years past, have we not?

Mr. CROMER. I am not familiar with that. I know what the former bill carries, but I can not understand why this $7,500 is in this bill, because one year ago we appropriated $7,500 for this same purpose, and I may be mistaken, but I think it would be perfectly proper to strike out the entire paragraph.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. CROMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Let me ask the gentleman this question. You say a year ago this appropriation was $7,500. Was it for this same identical purpose?

Mr. CROMER. Yes, sir; it was in the bill passed a year ago.

Mr. SIBLEY. But the meeting of the congress was delayed.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, the bill which was passed last year for the present fiscal year carried $7,500 for the compensation and expenses of a United States delegate to the Universal Postal Congress to convene at Rome. At the time the bill was then considered the convention had been called for April of the present year. The delegate had been appointed by the President under the law and authorized by this appropriation as well as existing law. At the time the present bill, now under consideration, was before the Post-Office Committee the Government of Italy notified the United States Government of a postponement of the postal congress this present year for one year, and notification, of course, naturally followed that no delegates need attend during the present year.

The committee felt, however, Mr. Chairman, that inasmuch as this Government had been a strong and influential factor in the postal congress which had heretofore been held that we ought to reappropriate the fund which had been intended for the convention of the present year. We therefore made this provision which is now under consideration. I confess, Mr. Chairman, that we could appropriate but $5,000 or $3,000 or $2,000. What influence, however, the United States Government may have in these conventions, large as it is, may be far below the other countries of the world which send delegates to these congresses, in view of the manner in which they take care of their respective representatives. A great government like this, whose postal service exceeds that of any other nation on the earth, who is seeking influence in an international congress, can not afford, simply for the purpose of strict economy, to be too strict in the amount of the allowance for this purpose.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield.

Mr. BURKETT. How many delegates have we always sent to these international congresses?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I can not give exactly each instance, but it is my impression that on one occasion there were three, and, I think, on another there were two. If we increase the number of delegates, it would increase the amount of expenditure.

Mr. BURKETT. Well, the amount of expenditure never has been over this amount, was it, when we sent three delegates?

Mr. OVERSTREET. In 1900, I am informed, we had but one delegate, and I think the appropriation that year was $3,000. I do not remember what the appropriation was at the convention when there were three delegates. I think, however, that the gentleman will remember that the convention to which he is evidently referring was held in this country, and necessarily the amount of expenditure would be greatly lessened.

Mr. TAWNEY. And held in this city.

Mr. BURKETT. I did not refer to any particular convention, but I notice in here the words "compensation and expenses." Were those two words "for compensation" in the provision in the last bill of which this is a reenactment? Has it been customary to pay a compensation to these delegates?

Mr. OVERSTREET. This is the identical language of the last preceding bill, and it authorizes a delegate to this convention which was postponed.

Mr. BURKETT. What I am trying to get at is——

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman will pardon me, my recollection is that the appropriation in former bills where the delegates were appointed did carry compensation as well as expenses. That is my understanding.

Mr. BURKETT. Well, then I want to ask the gentleman——

Mr. OVERSTREET. Pardon me just a moment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] very properly calls my attention to the fact that at one of the recent conventions held in a foreign country the Second Assistant Postmaster-General attended, and of course there was no compensation, the usual compensation being granted while he was engaged in this service.

Mr. BURKETT. Well, supposing this delegate appointed by the Postmaster-General appoints some man in the Department?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I should say that the compensation would not be allowed, and whatever is appropriated would be covered back into the Treasury.

Mr. BURKETT. How, under the law, could you prevent a man from drawing the salary, even though he was the Postmaster-General himself?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think there is a regulation—or a law—that would prevent him from drawing the salary.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of objecting to this in the least. I do, however, think it proper to call the attention of the Members of this House and the attention of the country to the fact that here is an appropriation of $7,500 for a delegate to this convention who will probably be gone but a very few months. The expenses of going to Rome and returning can not be over $300, and while we appropriate for him $7,500, if there was a proposition before the House to-day to increase the salary of Members of the House to $7,500, I believe that nine-tenths of the Members of this House would in their hearts be favorable to it, and yet on a roll call not more than one in three would vote for it, although the salary of Members is the same to-day that it was forty years ago and, as everyone knows, is not sufficient to defray the expenses of Members living in a very unassuming and economical way. I want to call the attention of the Members of this House and of the country to the fact that we are willing to be fairly generous with other people, but we are such cowards and so much afraid that somebody will whisper in our districts that we are salary grabbers that we do not dare to vote for a decent salary for ourselves. [Applause.]

I understand that Mr. Loud is to be sent as a delegate. No more worthy, no more interested, and no person better able to discharge the duties of that position can be found than Mr. Loud. I think the amount appropriated here is very proper, although in all probability he will devote but a few months of the year to those duties.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. THAYER. Certainly.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman might well say that this delegate going into a foreign country, the expense of employing interpreters and clerks to aid him in the report to the United States would also be a part of his expenses.

Mr. THAYER. I suppose it would; but we have to have interpreters and clerks here, and it costs as much to live in Washington as it does to live in Rome; and it costs just about as much to many Members of this House to get here and return to their homes as it does to go to Rome and return. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Vermont?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I rose, Mr. Speaker, to ask the floor in my own right.

Mr. THAYER. Very well; I do not want to deprive the gentleman from Vermont of anything that he is entitled to in his own right. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts had not expired.

Mr. THAYER. I am through, Mr. Chairman. I supposed my time had expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman from Vermont will pardon me, I think debate has closed on this item. I do not want to enforce the rule, but merely to call attention to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point made by the gentleman from Indiana, chairman of the committee, is that debate is exhausted on this item.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this amendment of the gentleman from Indiana. I do not think it is worth any more to go over to Rome for three or four months than it is to sit here the year round and look after the affairs of our constituents. I have no doubt that if the chairman of the Post-Office Committee would amend the clause providing that the delegate should be the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, and that the term of service should be for five years, that the House would gladly agree to the $7,500 appropriation. [Laughter.] But as the chairman of the Appropriations Committee indicated the other day, and as the gentleman from Ohio indicated in his very able speech, these are the days in which we should practice economy, and we should practice economy when we send a delegate abroad to this convention.

They talk about delegates requiring interpreters. Why, we can find a man who will need no interpreter to go over there and represent us. So I say that I am heartily in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CROMER], and I think that $5,000 is a sufficient compensation for the three or four months which he will be required to spend there.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Vermont entertain us by telling us what this postal congress is anyhow? What are the duties of a delegate? What does he represent?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I understand that the delegate is expected to go over to Rome, sit around and look wise, and come back and report to the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. That he was over there. [Laughter.] What does he report besides the mere fact that he attended the convention?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. If any Member of Congress undertook to influence him improperly, before he started or while he was there, it would be his duty to report the fact. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly satisfied with the gentleman's explanation. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Vermont yield to me?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman whether, if a Member of Congress should see fit to make a suggestion to the postal delegate, it will be regarded as a crime by the Post-Office Department?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I think if the gentleman is selected whom it is now thought will be selected there would be danger of a case of assault and battery if a Congressman attempted to make a suggestion. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think that it will cost Mr. Loud $7,500 to go to Rome, sit around, and look wise?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Yes. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I hope the amendment will not prevail. It has been said that Mr. Loud will probably be selected. I think it is the sense of this House that there is no man probably in this Federal Union better qualified to represent the American postal system at a convention of that character. There is no man more thoroughly equipped. If you speak about economy, if we should send the Second Assistant Postmaster-General or the Third or the Fourth, if their time is worth anything, we should lose their time. The Government would be the loser for the time that it took them away from their duty and sent them abroad.

My friend says, "Of what use is this convention?" If he will recall the fact, with which I am sure he is familiar, he will remember that the postal conventions have made it possible for an American citizen to send his letters at a uniform rate of postage practically over all the civilized globe. Every business interest of this Union and every individual who sends a letter abroad has been benefited by the bringing together of these conventions and the making a common rate of postage applicable to all the nations of the globe.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. SIBLEY. Yes, with pleasure.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I agree with all the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said about our friend, Mr. Loud; but we do not know what he is going to do with the $7,500.

Mr. SIBLEY. I think the chairman of the committee has stated, or at least some other gentleman here, that it will be necessary to hire interpreters and clerks, and it will be necessary for him to put his American ideas into, perhaps, the Italian or the French tongue, whichever may be the language used; and I would ask my friend from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] if it is not the case, if he does not think that Mr. Loud perhaps did earn $5,000 a year here as a Member of this body, and earned it as faithfully and as well as any gentleman among us?

Mr. MADDOX. That is so.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. SIBLEY. Yes.

Mr. BURLESON. I will state that I am in favor of this item in the bill, and I hope Mr. Loud will be appointed a delegate; but as I understand it this congress has been postponed for one year.

Mr. SIBLEY. Yes.

Mr. BURLESON. And if so, an appropriation was made last year. Now, I want to know what has become of the money appropriated last year, considering the transactions that are taking place in the Post-Office Department—what has become of the amount of money appropriated last year?

Mr. SIBLEY. That was not used because that convention was not held, and it went over until another year.

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; that is what I understood, but what has become of the money?

Mr. SIBLEY. It was covered back into the Federal Treasury.

Mr. BURLESON. That is a gratifying assurance. [Laughter.]

Mr. CROMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. SIBLEY. Yes.

Mr. CROMER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania how long this congress is in session?

Mr. SIBLEY. I suppose it will be as impossible to determine that as it will be to determine how long we will be in session.

Mr. CROMER. The convention never lasts over thirty days, does it?

Mr. SIBLEY. Oh, I think my friend is in error about that. I am inclined to think there have been sessions which have been very much more prolonged. I do not think anyone can measure the usefulness of this. I want the appropriation large enough so that we can secure the services of just as good a man as Mr. Loud. My friend on my left here suggested a moment ago that up in his district he could find a man that would go over there and would not want an interpreter. I suppose that man has a job now up in some coke oven in Pennsylvania, but we would not want a man of that kind to represent us. [Laughter.]

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. SIBLEY. Yes.

Mr. THAYER. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that he thinks Mr. Loud as a Member of this House earned his $5,000. As a Member of this House, I would like to ask him in that connection whether he thinks he will earn any more as a delegate to Rome in the few weeks he will be there than he earned here representing his district in Congress?

Mr. SIBLEY. No; I do not. Possibly he may; I could not tell. [Laughter.]

Mr. THAYER. Why should we pay him any more as a delegate there on an ordinary mission for a very limited time than he received as a Representative here when a Member of this House for two years' work?

Mr. SIBLEY. I want to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I merely want this appropriation large enough so that Mr. Loud will accept the place, or that some man equally well qualified for the discharge of the duties will accept it. I do not want to see it a political position. I do not want to see some man selected merely because he has a political pull, but I would like to see the compensation large enough, and I think the entire Post-Office Committee—almost every member—went to the President and asked him on behalf of the usefulness of the Department to the merchants and the people who are interested in foreign mails to send Mr. Loud as their delegate.

Mr. THAYER. I am fully in accord with the gentleman from Pennsylvania in his desire to have Mr. Loud appointed to this position, and I am in accord with him in the amount of salary fixed, but I wish to call attention to the apparent inequality between this salary and the salary fixed, incorrectly it appears, for ourselves, and I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether if the proposition should come in here to increase our salaries to $7,500 a year he would vote for it?

Mr. SIBLEY. Why, I would, if the Lord would let me live long enough to do so.

Mr. THAYER. But without any "if" about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIBLEY. No "if" at all. I only regret that the gentleman does not give us such an opportunity.

Mr. THAYER. I am delighted to know that I have found one Member over there who has the courage of his convictions and is not afraid he may be called a "salary grabber."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CROMER) there were—ayes 79, noes 59.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. OVERSTREET and Mr. CROMER were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 88, noes 75.

So the amendment was agreed to. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

For compensation to postmasters, $23,250,000.

Mr. MADDOX. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee how many postmasters of the first class, the second class, the third class, and the fourth class we have and what pay they receive?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] I wish to state that at present there are 265 first-class postmasters, 1,208 second-class postmasters, 3,593 third-class postmasters, and something more than 69,000 fourth-class postmasters. The salaries paid to these respective classes of postmasters at the beginning of the present fiscal year amounted to $932,900 to first-class postmasters, $2,831,800 to second-class postmasters, $5,184,900 to third-class postmasters, and $13,039,874.04 to fourth-class postmasters.

The last post-office supply bill provided an appropriation of $21,750,000 for postmasters of all classes. The present bill, as members of the committee will note, calls for an appropriation of $23,250,000, being an increase of $1,500,000. According to the Auditor's figures, based upon the tables compiled for the last two or three years, the total increase in the salaries of postmasters has aggregated on the average $850,000.

The gentleman may ask what is the reason for this apparently abnormal increase of one million and a half of dollars in this bill. Mr. Grandfield, of the office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, stated in the hearings before the committee that heretofore the appropriation for salaries of postmasters for the ensuing fiscal year always fell short of the amount to which the postmasters at the beginning of the year were entitled, and as a consequence there was a deficiency from the first.

But taking into consideration that there has been an average annual increase of $850,000 during recent years and considering that the expenditure for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, was $21,631,724, as shown by the Auditor's books, and adding $850,000 for the increase of the present fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and another $850,000 for the fiscal year for which we are now providing, ending June 30, 1905, we have $23,331,724.

Now, the gentleman may further ask, Is there not some danger of increasing this amount to an excessive degree? I wish to say to the gentleman that, as he doubtless is aware——

Mr. MADDOX. I should like to say to the gentleman——

Mr. STAFFORD. I gladly yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDOX. The idea occurred to me that instead of increasing the total for compensation of postmasters there ought to be a decrease, from the fact that thousands of these offices are being abolished by the introduction of the rural-delivery service. I can not understand why you are increasing the compensation of postmasters when the post-offices are decreasing. I should be glad to have the gentleman tell us how the figures in this respect now stand as compared with the figures for last year—what is the present number of post-offices and what the decrease is.

A MEMBER. Many of the fourth-class post-offices have been abolished.

Mr. MADDOX. I understand that to be the fact.

Mr. STAFFORD. As to the inquiry just made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX], he must be aware that there is of course a gradual increase in the business of the first, second, and third class offices. Gentlemen may have noted, as published in the newspapers of last week, that with the quarter ending March 30, 1904, forty-nine offices ceased to be fourth-class offices and are now numbered among the third-class offices. According to the estimates to be found in the report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, it is expected that 125 offices will pass from the third class to the second class. In the same way there will be offices transferred from the second class to the first class. With the increase of business and the additional number of these offices converted into higher grades, the transfer carrying an increase of pay, there must of necessity be an enlarged appropriation for the salaries of postmasters.

As to the fourth-class offices, those that were discontinued by reason of the introduction of the rural-mail service were of no great importance. The allowances to fourth-class offices that have been discontinued would not average much more than $100 each.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent for an additional five minutes to explain this matter more fully.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks for an extension of five minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall be glad to do so in a minute, when I have finished this line of thought. As far as fourth-class offices are concerned, there were discontinued during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, in the neighborhood of 2,000, and, as I have just said to the gentleman, the average compensation paid to these fourth-class post-offices, very small ones, was less than $100 each.

Mr. MADDOX. We are really, then, not saving anything by abolishing these fourth-class post-offices?

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to say also that we are not saving anything by the discontinuance of the fourth-class offices and the substitution of rural routes, for the reason that, as the gentleman and the members of this committee are aware, the compensation of fourth-class offices is based upon the cancellation of stamps at their respective offices. Upon the discontinuance of a fourth-class office the stamps of the letters that were previously mailed there were of necessity canceled at some other office. If they are canceled at a fourth-class office, the payment goes to another fourth-class postmaster. If it goes to a third-class office, it is an increased allowance, by reason of the additional sale of stamps, which is the basis in these latter offices on which the salaries are paid.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do we not and should we not save something by reason of the fact that we do away with the star-route service—the old stage? We certainly ought to save some of the money that we paid the stage drivers.

Mr. STAFFORD. This allowance is for the salaries of postmasters, and that would have nothing to do with it. It might affect the amount that is allowed under another item, providing for the star-route service.

Mr. COWHERD. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that, notwithstanding we have established about 19,000 rural delivery routes, the total number of star routes has been cut down only 2,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But the gentleman has not taken into consideration the fact that where we substitute a rural carrier we do away with the star-route stage and the expenses that we formerly paid for that stage route. The gentleman, as I understand it, has only alluded to the cancellation of stamps at these fourth-class post-offices.

Mr. STAFFORD. That has nothing to do with the item we are now considering. As to the inquiry of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] why the compensation provided for in the bill has increased, I think that I have explained why there is a necessity for enlarging the appropriation in this item.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not think the gentleman has explained my proposition.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. What is the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no amendment pending before the House except the pro forma amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Then, Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have not yielded the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Mississippi that the gentleman from Wisconsin is now speaking to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have the floor, but I have no objection to the gentleman from Mississippi offering his amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I understood that the gentleman from Wisconsin had completed what he had to say and that he was merely answering a question. I will hold the amendment in abeyance.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman now. I do not think there are any further inquiries concerning this item. Therefore I give way to the gentleman from Mississippi.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I offer an amendment as a proviso after the word "dollars," on page 2, in line 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," on page 2, in line 5, insert the following:
"Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until the Postmaster-General shall have determined and published a fixed rule whereby clerical assistance shall be allowed or refused postmasters of all grades."

Mr. OVERSTREET. I reserve a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana reserves a point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe this is subject to a point of order, because it is merely a limitation upon the expenditure of the money herein appropriated. I need not dwell upon that, I hope. It is clearly in order for that reason. Every limitation upon an expenditure is in order.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that proviso ought to be adopted for a reason concerning which we have lately had abundant object lessons. Members of Congress have gone down to the Department to ask that clerical assistance be given postmasters, and they have found out later on that there was a secret rule that they did not know of whereby clerical assistance was determined by the Post-Office Department—a rule unknown to them and unknown to the postmaster who wrote to the Member of Congress to get the increase, perhaps.

Now, all that this amendment undertakes to do is to say that none of this money for compensating postmasters shall be expended until the Post-Office Department has determined and has made public a fixed rule whereby clerical assistance to postmasters of all grades shall be either granted or refused, so that postmasters may know and Members of Congress may know just what the rule is, and so that Members of Congress may not be unjustly and causelessly accused of having attempted unduly to influence the Post-Office Department to override a rule or regulation the existence of which they were ignorant of.

Now, I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] has prepared, and will offer later on, when we come to the clause relating to separating mail, an amendment of like character bearing upon that secret rule of the Department.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SCOTT. I would like to ask a question before you take your seat. Do you think it possible or practicable for the Postmaster-General to adopt a general rule that shall apply in all cases in the matter of clerical help in the post-offices?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Absolutely practicable, and altogether just; and it ought to be published. Now, all he has got to do is to publish the rule he has now, that he keeps secret, if it is a just rule; and if it is an unjust rule it ought to be abolished.

Mr. SCOTT. I understood it was entirely within the discretion of the Postmaster-General—that he may adapt it in such a way as to meet the individual case.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No, the gentlemen is mistaken about that. I understand Members of Congress have asked him what the rule was, and that he declined to give it to them, with the statement that it was thought incompatible with the public service to make it public.

Mr. SCOTT. I was not aware that such a statement had been made.

Mr. COWHERD. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state that there is no law now providing for salaries in third and fourth class post-offices, except the provision which reads "for unusual business," and for which we do not appropriate under the provision reading "for separating service." We provide for no salaries for third and fourth class postmasters.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Not by law, but by grant.

Mr. COWHERD (continuing). There is a law providing that in "case of unusual business," but there is no appropriation for it in this bill, and has not been for years. Now, I could not tell from the reading of the gentleman's amendment at the Clerk's desk, but if that covers by imputation permission to the Postmaster-General to give salaries, in his discretion only, by a rule, to third and fourth class postmasters, then I know that my friend will join with me in agreeing that the amendment should not be adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It does not. It is to give the rule whereby clerical assistance shall be given or refused.

Mr. COWHERD. But we do not allow clerical assistance to third and fourth class offices except in the case of separating service. The separating service is the only case in which we appropriate any money, and the Postmaster-General has the right to allow for clerical service, and when he allows for "unusual business" he does it in violation of the appropriation law, because, notwithstanding there is a general law which says they may have clerical hire "for unusual business," if this House or Congress refuses to appropriate for it he has no right to make the allowance.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I move to strike out the last word.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri is much better acquainted with the postal laws than I am. I have never served upon the Post-Office Committee, and I have never given any particular study or attention to the postal laws of the United States; but I do know that there is, as he says, a general law under which the Post-Office Department has the right under unusual circumstances—what is the exact language?

Mr. COWHERD. In "case of unusual business."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. In case of "unusual business" to give additional compensation in the way of clerical assistance. Now, what I want to get at is that we may know when in their opinion the "unusual-business" contingency has occurred, and when in their opinion the "unusual-business" contingency has not occurred, so that Members of Congress and other people can not be criticised about overriding a law the existence of which they were ignorant.

Mr. BOWIE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. BOWIE. Is the gentleman from Mississippi aware of the fact that Mr. Robb, the Assistant Attorney-General of the Post-Office Department, only yesterday ruled that there was no appropriation for clerk hire for unusual purposes, and that the fund given for separating purposes would be applied in the future as it had been applied in the past?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I was not aware of that.

Mr. BOWIE. Such a decision was certainly made yesterday.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I was not aware of that, and if the gentleman assures me that there has been such a decision, which controls the Post-Office Department, then my amendment is unnecessary.

Mr. BOWIE. It was published in the press yesterday. Of course I have never seen the amendment——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave that this clause be passed without detriment to the right of amendment until I can look into that matter.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, let me suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi that at a later period in the bill I am inclined to think his amendment would be proper, and the committee—at least I have—prepared amendments which will be offered, which, I think, move directly to the difficulty which the gentleman has been discussing.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman does not understand me——

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman will remember that we are now upon the item of the bill making appropriation to meet expenditures authorized by existing law for postmasters' salaries. This amendment of the gentleman has relation to the employment of clerks and would come properly in at the item below relative to clerks, and I think that when that item in the bill is reached it would shorten the time for discussion concerning the relevancy of the amendment——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, there are two clauses in the bill to which amendments of this character may lie. The clause of the bill to which the gentleman from Indiana has referred, beginning on line 8, page 11, reads: "For separating mails at third and fourth class post-offices."

Mr. OVERSTREET. It is at that point that I propose to offer an amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman from Texas has prepared an amendment, which I have seen, to enter there, for the purpose of determining and publishing the rule whereby compensation for separating mail shall be determined. Now, then, Mr. Chairman, the clause that I am offering this amendment to reads: "For compensation to postmasters," so much money. Now, they never make an allowance to a clerk eo nomine—to a clerk by name. He is not carried upon the rolls of the Government; it is simply "additional compensation to the postmasters for clerk hire."

Mr. OVERSTREET. In third-class offices.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes; it is additional compensation to the postmaster, and therefore, of course, it is germane to the clause which reads "For compensation to postmasters." Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that these lines 4 and 5, on page 2, be passed without detriment to the right of amendment until I can look into the matter called to my attention by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, against which the gentleman from Indiana, in charge of the bill, has reserved the point of order. The gentleman from Mississippi now asks unanimous consent——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, before that is done, we had better determine the point of order, because if it is out of order there is no use of reserving the right to bring it up later. However, I do not think it is out of order, because it is a limitation on an expenditure.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana wish to be heard on the question of the point of order?

Mr. PAYNE. I would suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi that he withdraw the amendment and not spend time on the point of order.

Mr. OVERSTEET. Mr. Chairman, I would also ask that the point of order go over without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana couples with the request that the point of order also go over without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salary and allowance division: For compensation to assistant postmasters at first and second class post-offices: Two, at $3,500 each; 20, at $3,000 each; 5, at $2,500 each; 5, at $2,000 each; 16, at $1,900 each; 24, at $1,800 each; 40, at $1,700 each; 92, at $1,600 each; 100, at $1,500 each; 100, at $1,400 each; 165, at $1,300 each; 300, at $1,200 each; 350, at $1,100 each; 305, at $1,000 each; 50, at $900 each; 40, at $800 each; and 40, at $700 each; in all, $2,037,800.

Mr. RIDER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 25, after the word "offices," insert:

"All clerks, of all designations, within the classified service, employed in the first-class post-offices, who are receiving a less salary than $1,200 per annum shall, after the 1st day of July, 1904, receive an annual promotion of $100 until their salaries shall amount to $1,200 per annum.

"All clerks, of all designations, within the classified service, employed in the second-class post-offices, who are receiving a less salary than $1,000 per annum shall, after the 1st day of July, 1904, receive an annual promotion of $100 until their salaries shall amount to $1,000 per annum.

"No clerk, of any designation, shall be appointed to a classified position in any first or second class post-office at a less salary than $900 per annum."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. RIDER. Mr. Chairman, the good of the postal service, as well as a desire to do justice to the post-office clerks, should prompt such legislation as will establish a fixed system of promotion.

The need for a definite system of classification has been recognized by every Postmaster-General since the time of General James, in 1881.

Extracts from the reports of former Postmasters-General are herewith submitted (Exhibit No. 1).

These extracts from reports demonstrate that it is the opinion of those competent to pass upon the matter that there should be a reclassification of salaries of post-office clerks. Then why should Congress refuse or decline to act upon the recommendations contained in these reports?

In Exhibit No. 1 will be found a memorial that was addressed to the Postmaster-General by the clerks' association on the 24th day of November, 1903. This memorial sets forth in detail the unfair conditions that surround the post-office clerks, and the injustice that the lack of system subjects the postal service to.

Salaries of letter carriers are fixed by law—$600 for the first year, $800 for the second year, and $1,000 for the third year of service.

The hours of carriers are limited by law to eight. The railway mail clerks receive $800 for their first year of service and $900 for the second year, after which promotion is rapid. The railway mail clerk works one week and is off one week. But the present law for post-office clerks provides for a minimum salary of $400 per annum with no provision of a definite nature for promotion. The hours of the post-office clerk are not limited, and frequently as many as twelve hours of service are exacted in one day.

Prior to July 1, 1899, Congress simply made a lump appropriation for the purpose of "clerk hire" in post-offices. The sum varied each year in amount, but about the period mentioned (1899) would average $10,000,000 annually.

It was the custom to turn this amount over to the superintendent of the salary and allowance division to be apportioned among the many different postmasters throughout the country.

The evils of this system were set forth in the report of Postmaster-General Howe in 1882, which is submitted herewith (Exhibit No. 1).

In 1899 Congress evidently recognized the iniquity of such a system, adopted the plan of making the so-called "segregated appropriation," and has continued this plan up to the present time.

These segregated appropriations aimed to fix the number of clerks that might be employed at any given salary.

But the recent investigation of the Post-Office Department demonstrated that the mere segregation of the items of appropriation will not establish system or prevent wrongdoing.

The investigation of the Post-Office Department simply developed the fact that the salary and allowance division paid no attention whatever to the limitations provided in the segregated appropriations for "clerk hire." It seems very evident that no definite estimate of the true and exact number of clerks in each salary grade was ever submitted to Congress.

In the report of the salary and allowance division for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1902 (Exhibit No. 2), a statement of the number of clerks promoted in each grade is submitted. This statement is entirely inconsistent with the provisions made by the preceding Congress. The fact that this report of the salary and allowance division was a public document shows that no attempt was made to conceal the fact that the law was violated. This failure to observe the intent of the law should have been taken cognizance of by the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department of the House of Representatives, whose duty it is under the rules of the House to exercise supervision over the expenditure of such appropriations.

The second session of the Fifty-seventh Congress, acting on the estimates submitted by the Post-Office Department, aimed to provide for the promotion of more than 7,000 post-office clerks last year.

The investigation of the Department showed that the estimates submitted were not a true indication of the actual number of clerks in the different grades.

As a result of suddenly attempting to comply with the provisions of the segregated appropriation, after so many years of failure to comply, more than 3,000 deserving post-office clerks were denied promotion, because it was found the grades to which they were to have been promoted were already filled, notwithstanding the estimates to the contrary as submitted to Congress.

The so-called segregated appropriations for "clerk hire" now run from $18,000,000 to $20,000,000 annually. There is practically no system for the distribution of the vast sum. Some one man is responsible for the work, and no matter how honest or capable he may be he can not make a just and equitable distribution of this sum of money.

Under this system favoritism or worse is bound to exist. Some post-offices receive greater consideration than they are entitled to, and many receive practically no consideration at all.

The need for a revision of the present system was so apparent that the Postmaster-General appointed a commission, composed of seven postmasters and the First Assistant Postmaster-General and superintendent of the salary and allowance division, to look into the subject of reclassification for post-office clerks. This commission met in Washington on December 22, 1903, and a copy of their report is submitted herewith as Exhibit No. 3.

This commission adopted a resolution asking favorable consideration for the theory of annual promotion for the great rank and file of the clerks as the correct solution of the present bad conditions.

Exhibit No. 4, an extract from the current report of the Postmaster-General, states that the number of clerks in each grade now complies with the number stipulated by Congress.

This report states that the end was achieved by taking advantage of the "5 per cent transfer clause in the law."

Now, in an extract from the current report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General (Exhibit No. 4), the present number of clerks in each grade is supposedly set forth. But the fact that the "5 per cent transfer clause" was taken advantage of is evidence within itself that the number of clerks in each grade now can not be what the estimate of the First Assistant would indicate, as his figures are the exact figures of the appropriation bill of last year.

The point in this is that Congress does not get an accurate estimate of existing conditions.

No matter who is in charge of the salary and allowance division, no good results can be expected without the adoption of a system that will be fair to all and establish like conditions in cities of the same class.

The investigation disclosed the fact that many influences were constantly working on the salary and allowance division to acquire special favors for some individual or for some particular office. The investigation actually produced evidence of the existence of a "promotion syndicate" operating in New York City and the vicinity for the purchase of promotions through a supposed Washington connection.

Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General Bristow in his report on the investigation recommended that Congress enact some restraining legislation to apply to the division of salaries and allowances. Even should the division of salaries and allowances comply with the letter of the law as provided in the segregated appropriations, no material reform is assured. It is still possible to distribute the promotions as fancy dictates.

There are over 1,500 postmasters clamoring for more clerks and more promotions; and is it not reasonable to suppose that the postmaster of greatest influence will obtain the lion's share, while the least influential or the one who cares least will obtain practically no relief for his clerks?

CLERK HIRE.

No other item connected with the expense of the bureau is deserving of so much consideration as this. The appropriations for it for two or three years past have been inadequate to meet the numerous and, in the main, absolutely necessary applications of postmasters for allowances for clerk hire or for separating purposes that the public may be properly and promptly served in the distribution and delivery of the mail matter. The bureau during these years has been very much embarrassed in its efforts to apportion the amounts appropriated, so as to satisfy the applicants for such allowances, and at the same time secure the best possible service in the most important localities. The appeals for such assistance annually seem to be increasing, both in number and importance. (Postmaster-General T. O. Howe. Quoted by Postmaster-General William F. Vilas, q. v.)

[Postmaster-General W. Q. Gresham, report 1883-84, p. 65.]

The necessity of such reductions, I regret to say, is becoming too frequent, and is always attended with much embarrassment to the Department and apparent injustice to the postmasters whose allowances are decreased. The appropriations for clerks in post-offices have been altogether too small for some years past, and not at all in proportion to the increase in postal business.

[P. 11.]

Postmasters, backed as many of them are by influential friends, have in some cases been unreasonable in their demands for allowances, and it is not surprising that some of them have received more than their share of the appropriation, while others have received less.

[Postmaster-General F. Hatton, report 1884, p. 43.]

Post-office clerks, as a rule, are underpaid. Their duties are exacting and require close attention. Their salaries are not sufficient to induce them to take a proper interest in their work.

[Postmaster-General Vilas, report 1887, p. 24.]

So far as the postal service is concerned, this large and increasing item of expenditure (besides others for rent, light, fuel, furniture, stationery, and necessary incidentals) is turned over to the Department to be disbursed, nominally, at the will of the head of it, practically by the clerks in the division of salaries and allowances, under correction of its chief and the first assistant. This is in striking contrast with the nice limitations fixed in the annual act for the service of the Department itself, appropriating but about $800,000 to be expended immediately under the eye of the officers charged with its government, in which the particular amount applicable to each of the various classes of clerks in each office and for each item of supplies is carefully assigned. A greater sum is appropriated by the Department for a single post-office.

I have been unable to find that there has ever been a regulation or order fixing system or principles upon which this vast sum of money is to be annually scattered. The First Assistant directs the entry of the necessary orders, prepared in the division and brought up by its chief, after such examination as he finds it possible to give in the mass of duties crowding upon him. The chief of the division makes his best effort to guess the proper sum for each importunate postmaster to expend, and the postmaster adjusts, subject to the same approval, the salaries of his force in accordance with his judgment of their merits. He files his roster of clerks and wages, and the Department, with good success upon the whole, sees to it that he spends for the prescribed objects the amount allowed. Inspectors are directed to examine the office in particular cases, and they assist by their opinions, formed on the ground, the ultimate discretion of the division chief and First Assistant. Such seems to have been from the beginning the only "system" known to the Department. In his report for the year 1882 Postmaster-General Howe directed attention to this subject and said of the prevailing usages:

"These large sums are distributed among the different post-offices entitled thereto by a series of orders, allotting so much to one and so much to another. In theory these orders are made by the First Assistant Postmaster-General; in practice they are made by a fourth-class clerk in the office of the First Assistant. No matter by whom made, this distribution will not be well made. Finite intelligence could not make a wise and just allotment of such a fund; infinite intelligence can not be obtained from fourth-class clerks."

Such a method of providing for the post-offices may have been adapted to the early days of the service, but with gradual expansion its errors, misjudgments, and inequalities must have been constantly accumulating. And it is a high mark of the integrity and fidelity of those who have had charge of the distribution that no other reproach can be aimed at the history of their office, and that reproach is not theirs; theirs is the credit that in such circumstances of embarrassment and difficulty it is no worse.

But the condition presented is sufficiently repulsive to any sense of administrative order and justice.

Among the large offices of the first class there is not only a similar disparity in the proportionate expenses of their maintenance, but little uniformity of organization, of principal officers, of gradation in clerks, in their assignment of duty, or compensation.

The present duty is to bring the existing conditions of this business faithfully and openly to your attention, to be submitted to Congress. It is, however, ardently to be hoped that a contrariety of opinion may not longer hinder and delay desirable improvement, but stimulate a discussion which shall evolve a practicable conclusion. The presentation of the foregoing instructions has been in acknowledgment of the obligation upon one who points out existing evils to propose at least some betterment.

[Postmaster-General John Wanamaker, report for 1892.]

THE CLASSIFICATION OF CLERKS.

The carriers are placed upon a definite and determined scale of salaries, and that is well. Not so the post-office clerks, and yet the duties of the latter are more exacting, their hours of labor—days, nights, and Sundays—are longer, their work is indoors and often in unventilated rooms, and often, too, in unhealthy basements lighted by gas; and, indeed, for these reasons and because of their liability to contagious diseases, their occupation is more dangerous. Yet the present classification law works great injustice and hardship to them. In the past year, as Postmaster Hale, of Minneapolis, writes me, 104 persons have sought examinations for the carrier service against 20 applicants for clerkships. Undoubted facts like this are not wanting to attest the gross injustice.

I have heretofore called attention to the need of a reclassification in the first and second class offices. These now number 796, and show receipts by the recent adjustment aggregating $45,462,624, or 64.12 per cent of the total postal revenue. The total number of clerks and employees attached to first and second class post-offices is 9,965.

[Postmaster-General W. S. Bissell, report for 1893, p. 12.]

In this connection I desire to record my opinion that certain classes of clerks in first and second class post-offices are inadequately compensated, and I recommend that the Congress amend the act approved March 2, 1889, making provision for the classification and the fixing of salaries of clerks and employees attached to first and second class post-offices by increasing the maximum salaries for certain classes of clerical service. Material improvement in the clerical service has resulted from the operations of that act, and further improvement is easily possible.

[Postmaster-General William L. Wilson. Extracts from letter written by him to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of the House of Representatives on April 9, 1896.]

The present alleged classification act, covered by section 415, Postal Laws and Regulations, edition of 1893, has caused the Department a large amount of annoyance, and has resulted in confusion by reason of the fact that the bill was loosely drawn and embodied so many terms that were considered synonymous by the different postmasters that it was an impossibility for the Department to have a clear and distinct understanding of the situation at all first and second class post-offices, particularly at the larger first-class post-offices.

* * * It may not be amiss to add that there is not now sufficient encouragement to our best clerks to warrant their remaining in the service; consequently a large number of such clerks annually leave the service to follow other vocations.

In the report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General for the fiscal year ending June, 1900, he says:

"The present classification act of Congress of March 2, 1899, does not properly or satisfactorily classify, embodying many confusing and synonymous designations, and does not provide for regular advancement."

In the report of the Post-Office Department for the year 1901, on page 92, the First Assistant Postmaster-General says:

"I desire again to urge upon Congress the necessity for a reclassification of the post-office clerks in the first and second class post-offices.

"The classification act of March 2, 1889, does not meet the present needs of the service and offers no incentive or inducement for the bright and energetic young man to remain in the Government employ."

Memorial to the Postmaster-General in behalf of the proposed classification of clerks in the first and second class post-offices.

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 24, 1903.

Hon. HENRY C. PAYNE,
Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Acting in behalf of the United National Association of Post-Office Clerks, we desire to submit for your consideration the accompanying draft of a proposed bill for the classification of post-office clerks employed in the first and second class post-offices. This draft of bill was framed in accordance with the expressed wish of our membership in convention assembled at Nashville, Tenn., September 7 to 11, 1903. Since your incumbency of the office of Postmaster-General much has been done to relieve the conditions of the post-office clerks.

That the relief accorded them may be theirs in the future and that the service may be benefited by attracting and holding in its employ clerks of a high standard of ability, we ask your favorable consideration of this proposed bill and trust that the same will receive your indorsement. It is quite generally conceded that the classification act of March 2, 1889, under which the post-office clerks are now supposed to be classified, has failed to do justice to the clerks and has also failed to provide properly for the needs of the great and growing postal service. Before entering further into this line of argument, we respectfully request that you give due consideration to the accompanying extracts taken from the reports of the different Postmasters-General from the time of Postmaster-General Thomas L. James, in 1881. A perusal of these extracts will demonstrate that those who have been in charge of the Post-Office Department, and who have witnessed its many operations at first hand, have early concluded that some provision should be made by Congress to provide proper classification for post-office clerks.

In asking you to give favorable consideration to this bill, we recognize the necessity of submitting arguments that will prove how pernicious is the present system of classification and wherein this proposed act will furnish a satisfactory remedy, granting justice to this class of employees and protecting the best interests of the Department. Prior to the act of March 2, 1889, there was practically no legislation on the subject, except the statutes authorizing allowances to certain postmasters for expenditures for the necessary cost of clerical services. Of course the act of January 16, 1883 (known as the "Pendleton Act"), prescribed that within sixty days it shall be the duty of the Postmaster-General, in general conformity to section 163, Revised Statutes, to separately arrange in "classes" the employees of post-offices where the whole number of said employees shall together amount to as many as fifty; but reference to section 163 shows that only Department clerks came within its purview, and while the general purposes of this statute were accomplished, it presented no practical scheme for the classification and compensation of post-office clerks. Under the system which had thus grown up from the general authority first mentioned, the Postmaster-General would submit to Congress in advance for each fiscal year an estimate (or, as former Postmaster-General Vilas termed it, a "guess") of the probable cost of clerk hire. When the bulk appropriation was made a certain amount was allowed by the chief of the salary and allowance division to each post-office authorized to employ clerks.

The responsibilities that necessarily devolved upon anyone filling the position of chief of the salary and allowance division must be apparent to all.

Perhaps in no other Department of the Government, and certainly not in any department of a private corporation, was such absolute power over an army of employees vested in one man as was the case in this Department. Unfairness and inequality in the matter of salaries could not be prevented under such a system. Under this system a clerk in one post-office may receive but one-half the salary of another clerk in a different city who is discharging duties of exactly the same nature. Two clerks work side by side in the same office, perform the same duties, and yet one of them receives twice the compensation of the other, who is often the better clerk and longer in the service. One clerk performs a much higher grade of work and receives a smaller compensation.

Yet the post-office clerk's salary, admitted generally to be the poorest paid by the Government, is not assured from year to year, so uncertain are the estimates and so uncertain the appropriations of Congress. Then, too, he may be the victim of the caprice of the ever-changing postmasters. The act of March 2, 1889, may have been intended to correct these evils. It is called a "classification act;" but this seems to be a misnomer of the worst sort. The only difference that this act has made, so far as we are able to determine, is the fact that clerks are now paid in even hundreds of dollars. The system is just the same in substance as formerly. There is the same element of uncertainty.

Surely it must appeal to reason that this system, designed for the service in the early days of the Government, is too antiquated for the needs of this great and growing service of to-day. It must be remembered that the day of the postchaise and stagecoach has long since passed. Surely a branch of the service employing an army of some 20,000 clerks should be modernized.

To demonstrate how vague and uncertain is this so-called "classification act," we ask you to consider the following three paragraphs, which apply to the majority of post-office clerks:

"Mailing clerks, letter distributers, dispatchers, registry, money-order, directory, and pixie clerks, nine classes, salary graded in even hundreds of dollars from $600 to not exceeding $1,400 per annum.

"Separators and assorters, paper distributers, record clerks, general-delivery clerks, inquiry clerks, clerks for special-delivery mail, raters of third and fourth class matter, stock or supply clerks and timekeepers, seven classes, graded in even hundreds of dollars from $600 to not exceeding $1,200 per annum.

"Stampers and mail messengers, five classes, salary graded in even hundreds of dollars from $400 to not exceeding $800 per annum."

The grading in these sections is very artificial. They simply mean that the clerk in the rank and file may be paid any salary, just so it is in even hundreds of dollars from $400 to $1,400, regardless of the work performed.

Regardless of the rating or designation that may appear after a clerk's name on the pay roll, he may be performing duties of an entirely different nature. This can hardly be avoided under the present system.

The mails must be dispatched and the general routine of business transacted, regardless of these fine theoretical distinctions and designations. Every clerk must hold himself ready to perform any task assigned him.

Within the past few years Congress, in making appropriations for clerk hire in post-offices, has made segregated appropriations; that is, a certain number of clerks were allowed a certain salary. These segregated appropriations have been more liberal than those heretofore granted; but no genuine reform in the old system can be accomplished in this way.

But we submit it as our opinion that the adoption of the so-called "segregated appropriation" was a step of progress. In making these segregated appropriations the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads was supposed to have submitted to it a positive and authentic statement of the number of clerks employed at a given salary. Thus the committee was in a position to act intelligently in recommending to Congress a definite number of promotions in each grade, and were able to maintain a fair balance, neither top-heavy nor the opposite. It will be observed that in making these segregated appropriations, Congress has gradually reduced the number of clerks who were formerly employed at salaries of $400 and $500 per annum. Competent help could not be induced to enter the service at such salaries.

Under the old system of making lump-sum appropriations, Congress was not able to obtain a comprehensive knowledge of the salaries paid to the individual clerk. To go back to the lump-sum appropriation might result in the employment of more clerks at $400 and $500 per annum, because the present law permits these minimums.

The act of March 2, 1889, is still in force. The appropriation bill but covers the needs of the service for one year and makes no provision for the regular advancement of clerks. Neither does it attempt to designate how many clerks at a given salary may be assigned to any particular post-office. It still leaves a tremendous power in the office of the superintendent of salary and allowances.

The bill which we present for your consideration, if formally enacted, will substitute certainty for uncertainty. It provides simply that all clerks in first-class offices, regardless of all designations, shall be appointed at a salary of $900 per annum, and that they shall receive an annual increase of $100 per annum thereafter until they reach the salary of $1,200 per annum—surely not too much for any clerk who is fit to stay in the service the necessary six years after appointment. Above the grade of $1,200 all promotion is made under such rules and regulations as the Postmaster-General may prescribe. In the second-class offices the clerk is to enter at a salary of $600 per annum and be increased annually thereafter at the rate of $100 until the maximum of $1,000 is reached. Under the regulation of the Postmaster-General these clerks may be further advanced to $1,200 per annum.

We submit that the passage of this measure would not only grant tardy justice to the post-office clerks, the only branch of the Government service not now paid on a definite and fair schedule, but would bring a lasting benefit to the postal service. Better and brighter men would enter the service had they the assurance of fair promotion. The brightest and best men in the service would remain. That under the present conditions the ablest men leave the service is ably attested in the reports of some of the Postmasters-General submitted herewith.

In these prosperous times it is found difficult to induce bright, energetic young men to take the civil-service examinations for this branch of the service. The result is that the least competent of the applicants find their way into the service because of the unwillingness of the more able to qualify. This statement can be verified upon application to any civil-service examiner.

Is it not time to call a halt on the process of using the post-office as a mere training school for positions in the outside world? All the Federal employees are classified and paid upon a somewhat definite basis, while we, the post-office clerks, who, as stated by the late Hon. S. S. Cox, "receive less pay, work more hours, and perform more onerous and indispensable duties than perhaps any other officials in the Government service," are still left to the mere chance of an antiquated system.

Departmental and custom employees are classified and receive a rate of pay compared to which ours dwindles to insignificance. Our duties are indeed arduous and complicated. Frequently many hours of study are demanded, even after the ending of a period of duty lasting from nine to twelve hours. There is no eight-hour law for us. The vacation now received is for the most part earned by performing double duty at the cost of even greater hours. No compensation is provided for the employment of substitutes for the majority of clerks on vacations. Our brothers, the letter carriers and railway-mail clerks, do not have to endure these conditions.

In many offices the clerks are compelled to work in cellars or in old, crowded, antiquated, and poorly ventilated buildings. The long period of substitution that a clerk must undergo, making at such times barely sufficient to sustain life, must be taken into consideration in the proposed regulation of our salaries.

It must be borne in mind that there are some 1,500 postmasters in the different first and second class post-offices of the country, and each of these is master of the destiny of the clerks under him. They are all possessed of different ideas as to promotion. Some have greater influence than others, and make more strenuous efforts to obtain from the salary and allowance division promotions for their clerks. Some are utterly indifferent as to the welfare of their clerks, and fail to make recommendations for promotions, thereby doing a positive injury to those under them. This results in the employees of one office being better treated than those of another.

Almost every postmaster in the country would gladly be rid of the importunities of men prominent in the world of politics, business, or religion in behalf of some clerk's promotion who has sought their assistance. It is not always the most competent clerk who can command such influence. Surely those in the lower grade, particularly, should not be compelled to seek such influences to obtain promotion. Where is the merit in such an order of things? In fact, it seems that there is not much question but what the post-office clerk is underpaid. The only argument that seems to be raised against this proposed legislation is the contention of some that to advance a salary each year would rob the clerk of his incentive to the best endeavor. And yet a reference to the reports of the Postmaster-General, herewith submitted, will disclose the fact that in their belief the present system affords no incentitive, and in their opinion a reclassification along the lines suggested by us would surely furnish honest incentive to the very best endeavor. We feel that the average man will work more faithfully where fairly dealt with and with the certain prospect of promotion before him. There is something for him to labor for. If he will not work faithfully under these conditions, then he should be promptly removed from the service. Salaries throughout the Government service are usually fixed, or else promotion is largely based upon seniority of service. In the industrial world wages of those employed at the various trades are fixed. And in the industrial world there has been a steady upward tendency of wages and salaries.

In the Army and Navy we find promotion based upon seniority of service. Yet you hear no criticisms of its efficiency.

In some States we find State laws governing the salaries of school-teachers upon the basis of seniority of service. Our school system is admittedly a splendid one. In fact, the majority of public employees are paid upon the basis of either a fixed salary or promotion on seniority of service.

We find that the salaries of postmasters are fixed upon the basis of the receipts of the post-office over which they preside. Yet the postmaster is not in a position to honestly influence the receipts of his office. The receipts are dependent upon the business life of the community in which the office is located.

Even the salaries of our Congressmen and Senators are fixed by law, under the theory that all Congressmen render the Government a like service. In committee appointments it seems that as a general rule the Congress has been unable to devise a better system of promotion for its Members than by seniority of service.

While this measure which we submit for your consideration only applies to the clerks of the rank and file, we recognize the necessity of a complete reclassification of all those employed in the clerical service, from the assistant postmaster down; but we do not deem it to be within our province to suggest or offer amendments to the Department that would concern these official positions. We are of the opinion that the shortcomings of the act of 1889, in so far as it applies to the official class of clerical help in the post-office, are quite familiar to the Department, and that it is not unlikely that the Department will recommend to Congress that suitable changes be made to correct these recognized omissions. But we earnestly petition you that should the Department see fit to ask Congress to change that part of the act of 1889 that applies to the clerks of the rank and file that our recommendations contained herein be incorporated therein. We believe there are many postmasters throughout the country whose experience has been such that they would gladly welcome the enactment by Congress of a measure such as we submit herewith.

We make no appeal for the drone. There is no place for him in the industrial world, and there should be no place for him in the Government employ.

We submit it as our belief that the bill which we are now asking you to favorably consider is drafted along the only lines that will prevent favoritism and grant justice to the post-office clerks. We trust that this appeal, backed up by the expert opinion of so many who have been in charge of the Post-Office Department, will not go unheeded.

Respectfully submitted.

COMMITTEE UNITED NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF POST-OFFICE CLERKS.

RECLASSIFICATION OF CLERKS.

I desire again to renew, with increased emphasis, my recommendation of the necessity for a reclassification of clerks in first and second class post-offices. The very generous appropriations made for the past four years by Congress have enabled the Department to increase the salary of every low-grade, meritorious clerk, and to-day these clerks are receiving about as large annual salaries as they would receive had they been employed under any proposed classification bill. The service has grown so rapidly, however, that the Department has been obliged to augment the force by the employment of many additional clerks of the lowest grade, so that the average pay for clerks in the postal service is practically no better than it was four years ago.

On July 1 last every known capable and energetic clerk receiving a salary of $300, $400, $500, $600, $700, $800, and $900, who had been one year in the postal service or in these grades for a similar period, received a substantial increase in his salary ($100 being the minimum), as follows:

Clerks.	Receiving—	Advanced to—
117	$300	$400
443	400	500
1,016	500	600
2,200	600	700
1,750	700	800
2,100	800	900
1,700	900	1,000
1,300	1,000	1,100
144	1,100	1,200
198	1,200	1,300
176	1,300	1,400
11,144

Thus, out of about 12,000 promotions made by the Department to date more than 11,000 clerks were promoted in the lower grades, as above shown. In an experience of more than twenty-three years it can be asserted without fear of contradiction that the postal service at this writing is on a most substantial basis; the clerks as a rule are willing, efficient, and well satisfied, and the mails are better and more intelligently handled than ever. In the larger first-class post-offices the clerks are not working in excess of eight hours, and in New York and Chicago, where for some years past more or less congestion had existed, the mails are being dispatched earlier by several hours than heretofore.

With the increased business, however, it will be difficult, if not impossible, to maintain these conditions without the increases mentioned below.

A careful estimate for clerk hire for first and second class post-offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, shows that the Department will practically require as large an appropriation for its ordinary necessities as it would to make the following classification bill effective as a law:

"PROPOSED CLASSIFICATION OF CLERKS IN FIRST AND SECOND CLASS POST-OFFICES.

"That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized to classify and fix salaries of clerks and employees of first and second class post-offices from and after July 1, 1903, as hereinafter provided:

"At first-class post-offices.

"Class 1: Auditors at New York, N. Y., and Chicago, Ill.; salary, $3,000 each.

"Class 2: Superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, and superintendents of registry; salary, graded in even hundreds of dollars, not exceeding 45 per cent of the salary of the postmaster, five classes, at $1,400, $1,600, $1,800, $2,200, and not exceeding $2,700 per annum, except at New York, N. Y., where the salary of the superintendent of delivery, superintendent of mails, superintendent of money order, and superintendent of registry shall be fixed at $3,200 per annum each.

"Class 3: Cashiers, six classes; salary, $1,600, $1,800, $2,000, $2,200, $2,400, and not exceeding $2,600 per annum.

"Class 4: Assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents, bookkeepers, finance clerks, foremen of crews, inspectors of stations, physicians, and private secretaries, four classes; salary, $1,200, $1,400, $1,600, and not exceeding $1,800, except at New York, N. Y., where the salary of the first and second assistant superintendents of registry shall be fixed at $2,400 and $1,800, respectively, and that of the first and second assistant superintendents of money order shall be fixed at $2,400 and $1,800, respectively.

"Class 5: Superintendents of stations, eight classes; salary, $1,000, $1,200, $1,400, $1,600, $1,800, $2,000, $2,200, and not exceeding $2,500, according to the amount of business transacted.

"Class 6: Clerks in charge of stations, nine classes; salary, graded in even hundreds of dollars, from $100 to not exceeding $900 per annum, according to the amount of business transacted.

"Class 7: Carpenters, firemen, janitors, laborers, messengers, porters, pressmen, and watchmen, four classes; salary, graded in even hundreds of dollars, from $400 to not exceeding $700 per annum.

"That all clerks employed as assorters, directory clerks, general-delivery clerks, inquiry clerks, money-order clerks, mailing clerks, registry clerks, stamp clerks, distributers, nixie clerks, record clerks, special-delivery clerks, supply clerks, raters, mail weighers, separators, dispatchers, timekeepers, stampers, utility clerks, in the first-class post-offices now established, and in each post-office that may on or after July 1, 1903, become a post-office of the first class, who at the date of July 1, 1903, may be receiving salaries of less than $1,000 per annum, shall thereafter, from said date, receive annual increases of $100 per annum until their salaries shall amount to $1,000 per annum; and, furthermore, that clerks receiving salaries of $1,000 per annum may, in the discretion of the Post-Office Department, receive annual increases of $100 until their salaries shall amount to $1,400 per annum, and that said annual increases shall be governed by such rules and regulations as the Post-Office Department may make.

"At second-class post-offices.

"Class 1: Clerks in charge of stations, nine classes; salary, graded in even hundreds of dollars, from $100 to not exceeding $900 per annum, according to the amount of business transacted.

"Class 2: Janitors, laborers, messengers, porters, and watchman, four classes; salary, graded in even hundreds of dollars, from $300 to not exceeding $600 per annum.

"That all clerks in the second-class post-offices employed as assorters, directory clerks, general-delivery clerks, inquiry clerks, money-order clerks, mailing clerks, registry clerks, stamp clerks, distributers, nixie clerks, record clerks, special-delivery clerks, supply clerks, raters, mail weighers, separators, dispatchers, timekeepers, stampers, utility clerks, who on the 1st day of July, 1903, may be receiving salaries of less than $800 per annum shall thereafter from said 1st day of July, 1903, receive increases of $100 per annum until their salaries shall amount to $800 per annum; and, furthermore, the clerks receiving salaries of $800 per annum may, in the discretion of the Post-Office Department, receive additional promotions up to the amount of $1,000.

"That when the salaries hereinbefore stated are adjusted and fixed no clerk shall be appointed, promoted, reduced, or removed without the approval of the Postmaster-General: And provided, That clerks and employees, however designated, when detailed to other duties shall not be entitled to additional compensation.

"That all acts and parts of acts that conflict with the provisions hereinbefore stated are hereby repealed."

This estimate provides that all clerks in second-class post-offices receiving annual salaries of less than $800 be given annual increases until $800 is reached, and all clerks in first-class post-offices receiving annual salaries of less than $1,000 be annually increased until $1,000 is reached. The bill also fixes the minimum at second-class post-offices at $500 and at first-class post-offices at $600 per annum. The average post-office clerk is certainly the peer of the letter carrier, and this bill simply provides that a post-office clerk shall receive a salary of $1,000 in first-class post-offices at the end of four years' satisfactory service. Under the present law regulating letter carriers' salaries a letter carrier receives $1,000 salary at the end of two years.

The estimate to meet this bill provides an increase of $1,412,100, promotes 10,415 clerks in the lower grades, and provides for the appointment of 2,285 clerks additional, at $500 and $600 per annum. An estimate without regard to the proposed classification bill would only admit of a reduction of $100,000, but in order to make this reduction the Department would be required to employ many new clerks at $500 instead of $600 per annum.

CLERK HIRE AND SEPARATING MAILS AT THIRD AND FOURTH-CLASS POST-OFFICES.

The Department has repeatedly recommended to Congress that a small allowance for clerk hire or a deputy postmaster be allowed postmasters of offices of the third class when it has been satisfactorily demonstrated that the postmaster by devoting his entire time to the duties of the office can not, unaided, meet the public demands. It is obvious that no one person can continuously, without relief, keep a post-office open during the hours required by the Department, and it is equally clear that many of the larger third-class post-offices require at times more than two persons. There are 1,680 post-offices at which the salaries of the postmasters range from $1,500 to $1,900 per annum, at many of which postmasters have no allowances whatever. It is recommended that when the postmaster does not "farm" out his post-office—that is, when he devotes his entire time to the duties of the office and can not, without assistance, render a prompt and satisfactory service—he be allowed one regular clerk at a salary not to exceed $500, upon proper authorization by this Department.

Statement of transactions in separating clerk hire during the year ended June 30, 1902.

Item.	Amount.
Separating clerk hire standing June 30, 1901	$930,602
Allowances made during the year	169,615
Temporary allowances made	32,817
Allowances reduced and discontinued	60,016
Net increase during the year	109,599

It is recommended that an appropriation of $1,300,000, an increase of $200,000, be requested.

TEMPORARY CLERK HIRE.

The regular clerk hire appropriation under the present segregation not being available for temporary or emergency clerk hire at the larger postoffices, it is recommended that this appropriation covering temporary clerk hire at first and second class post-offices be made $300,000, an increase of $25,000.

SUBSTITUTES FOR CLERKS ON VACATION.

This appropriation has enabled the Department to provide substitutes for about all of the clerks in second-class post-offices and some of the clerks in the smaller first-class post-offices during their vacations. With the increased force allowed July 1, 1902, however, it will be necessary to increase same. Hence it is recommended that an appropriation of $200,000, an increase of $25,000, be requested.

PROVIDING FOR PRESIDENTIAL POST-OFFICES.

The annual adjustment of postmasters' salaries for the present fiscal year, under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1883, resulted in assigning 4,783 offices to the Presidential class. These offices, together with the stations connected with first and second class post-offices, and offices that may be advanced to the Presidential class during the present fiscal year, estimated at 350, are to be provided for out of this appropriation. As shown in statement under the head of "Leases," 250 post-offices and stations are in Government buildings, and these offices should be excluded, leaving 1,359 post-offices to be provided with rent, light, and fuel.

LEASES FOR POST-OFFICES.

On June 30, 1902, there were 1,245 post-offices of the first and second classes. Of this number 250 are in Government buildings and 842 in buildings leased to the Government. Three hundred and seven stations of first and second class post-offices and 210 post-offices of the third class are in leased buildings, a total of 1,359. The annual rental of these buildings on June 30, 1902, amounted to $1,207,439.

Class.	Number of post-offices in Government buildings.	Leased premises.
		Number.	Rental.
First class	161	55	$94,027
Stations	1	293	504,322
Second class	89	787	532,347
Stations	1	14	4,721
Third class	22	210	72,022
Fourth class	1	.....	.....
Total	275	1,359	1,207,439

The rapid growth of the rural free-delivery service affects the rent, fuel, and light appropriation perhaps more than any other single appropriation made the Post-Office Department by Congress. Many smaller post-offices are being discontinued and the work merged with some central office, which at once becomes a Presidential office and therefore entitled under the law to a reasonable allowance for rent, fuel, and light. These rural free-delivery centers are seldom established with fewer than three or four rural carriers, and the additional room and other facilities needed make the demands upon this appropriation almost continuous and frequently beyond the limit fixed by law.

When the buildings contemplated in the omnibus public building bill of the last Congress are made ready for occupancy they will undoubtedly save this appropriation, but there is no prospect of any of these buildings being occupied before from four to seven years.

In this connection it is desired to call the attention of Congress to the amounts of rentals paid for station premises at the twenty largest post-offices, as follows:

New York, N. Y	$224,410	Buffalo, N. Y	$5,070
Chicago, Ill	89,036	Cleveland, Ohio	5,110
Philadelphia, Pa	39,850	Detroit, Mich	4,880
Boston, Mass	46,585	Kansas City, Mo	4,792
St. Louis, Mo	3,010	Minneapolis, Minn	4,070
Brooklyn, N. Y	30,460	Washington, D. C	9,010
Cincinnati, Ohio	5,680	Milwaukee, Wis	2,775
Baltimore, Md	5,460	St. Paul, Minn	3,550
Pittsburg, Pa	7,740	New Orleans, La	3,400
San Francisco, Cal	17,931	Louisville, Ky	1,990

If Congress were to authorize the purchase of public-building sites for these stations, as under the public-building act, within a period of ten years there would be no occasion whatever for the payment of rentals for station purposes. In our larger cities the municipal governments have long since seen the wisdom and necessity of selecting permanent sites and erecting thereon suitable buildings for their police and fire departments, as have also the express companies; and as the postal service and its necessities have become permanently fixed, the selection of permanent homes for our station service would seem to be demanded in the interest of business prudence and economy.

It is recommended that an appropriation of $2,500,000, an increase of $150,000, for rent, fuel, and light be requested.

FOR MISCELLANEOUS AND INCIDENTAL ITEMS.

For necessary miscellaneous and incidental items directly connected with first and second class offices, including furniture, cleaning, electric motors and power, and all other items of expense not specifically provided for in other appropriations, $250,000.

"Provided, That the Postmaster-General, in his discretion, under such regulations as he shall prescribe, may authorize any postmasters of such offices to expend the fund he may allow them for such purposes without the written consent of the Postmaster-General."

And in addition 200 Doremus automatic hand-power machines were purchased at $225 each for post-offices where electric current was either too expensive or unavailable during the post-office business hours. Many of the smaller first and second class post-offices receive and dispatch mails coincidently, and postmasters are obliged during such periods to practically close the windows to the public. A canceling machine not only relieves several clerks of the necessity of postmarking or back stamping letters by hand, but insures as well a uniform and legible postmark, and at the same time protects the Government by a thorough cancellation. In my judgment, the canceling machine is better than two or three clerks at times, and has grown to be an indispensable adjunct to a post-office. It is suggested that each post-office of the first and second classes be provided with one or more canceling machines, and in order to make more satisfactory contracts with the owners thereof this Department be permitted to contract for a term not to exceed four years.

It is recommended that an appropriation of $300,000 be provided by Congress, and that payment for the motors and current therefor be made out of the miscellaneous and incidental appropriation. Many of the machines are run on an electric-meter basis, and with a small margin the Department is more or less embarrassed to keep such expenditures within the limits of the appropriation.

ASSISTANT SUPERINTENDENTS, SALARY AND ALLOWANCE DIVISION.

During the past year the assistant superintendents of this division have visited 778 post-offices, principally of the second and third classes, where the public accommodations and facilities have been greatly improved. Theretofore these post-offices had occupied quarters in connection with some other business, with decidedly primitive furniture, lock boxes, etc. In almost every instance post-offices were provided with exclusive quarters, fitted up with the latest improved furniture and equipment, and the public and press have commented upon the fact that the Department had at last given them post-offices in keeping with the importance and dignity of their localities.

Many of the larger first-class post-offices were visited during the past year after the postmaster's estimates had been submitted and same were carefully investigated before allowances were made.

It is recommended that an appropriation of $24,200 for salaries ($14,000) and per diem ($10,220) for seven assistant superintendents, be granted.

[Report of special committee called by Postmaster-General Payne to consider and advise as to legislation necessary to secure proper classification of postal employees.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 22, 1903.

Hon. H. C. PAYNE, Postmaster-General.

SIR: The committee appointed by you "to consider and advise as to legislation necessary to secure proper classification of postal employees" met at 6.30 o'clock p. m. of Tuesday, December 15, 1903, in parlor A of the Arlington Hotel, Washington, D. C., the following members being present: C. M. Waters, acting general superintendent salary and allowance division, Post-Office Department; F. B. Dickerson, postmaster of Detroit, Mich.; J. S. Graham, postmaster of Rochester, N. Y.; W. D. Hale, postmaster of Minneapolis, Minn.; G. A. Hibbard, postmaster of Boston, Mass.; J. L. Waite, postmaster of Burlington, Iowa; A. W. Mr. Waters was elected temporary chairman and took the chair.

On motion of Mr. Dickerson, Hon. Robert J. Wynne, First Assistant Postmaster-General, was made permanent chairman, and presided during the meetings of the committee.

Mr. G. A. Hibbard was made vice-chairman.

The proposed classification of clerks in first and second class post offices recommended in the report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, to take the place of the present act of Congress classifying clerks in post-offices, was discussed item by item. After full discussion the following measure was approved:

"Provided, That when the salaries hereinbefore stated are adjusted and fixed, no clerk or employee shall be reduced or advanced in grade or salary without the approval of the Postmaster-General.

"That all acts and parts of acts that conflict with the provisions hereinbefore stated are hereby repealed."

This classification differs from that proposed in the report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General in the following particulars:

The office of second assistant postmaster is created at offices having receipts of $2,000,000 and upward. This will affect five post-offices—New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, and St. Louis. The present law provides for a second assistant postmaster at New York only.

Auditors are provided for at offices having receipts of $2,000,000 and upward, instead of allowing such position at all post-offices.

Night superintendents are allowed only at offices having receipts of $600,000 and upward.

Superintendents of inquiry are allowed at New York and Chicago only.

The maximum salary of assistant superintendents of the four principal divisions (assistant superintendent of mails, of delivery, of money order, and of registry) is raised from 30 to 35 per cent. The office of examiner of stations, at from $1,400 to $2,000, is created. The position of assistant auditor is eliminated. The position of superintendent of second-class matter is created. The salary of assistant superintendent of stations is fixed at from $1,000 to $1,800 instead of on a percentage basis. The minimum salary of clerks at first-class post-offices is raised from $500 to $600.

The committee strongly indorses the recommendation made by the First Assistant Postmaster-General in his annual report that the appropriation for clerks in first and second class post-offices be made in a lump sum rather than segregated into grades.

The committee adopted a resolution calling the attention of the Postmaster-General to the advisability of adopting a different rule relative to the probationary appointment of substitute clerks. At present the Civil Service Commission holds that the six months' probation of a clerk begins with his appointment as a substitute. A postmaster is thus called upon to recommend permanent appointment at the end of six months' probation as a substitute, and it sometimes happens that he has absolutely no opportunity to judge as to the man's qualifications. It would seem that the probationary appointment should begin with the appointment as a regular clerk instead of as a substitute.[a]

A resolution was adopted calling the attention of the Postmaster-General to the advisability of providing a regular salary for substitute clerks.

The following resolution was also adopted:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this committee that careful consideration should be given by the Postmaster-General in the matter of a yearly increase of salary of $100 per annum to clerks in post-offices of the first class up to the $1,000 grade: Provided, however, That no advancement be made without the recommendation of the postmaster, approved by the Department.

"It is also the sense of this committee that the policy of an eight-hour schedule, as now in vogue, be adhered to and extended wherever practicable."

Before adjournment the committee expressed its appreciation of the honor conferred on the individual members by the Postmaster-General in designating them for committee service. A vote of thanks, as indicated, was adopted unanimously.

The committee adjourned subject to the call of the chairman.

Respectfully submitted.

EXHIBIT No. 4.

PAY AND HOURS OF CLERKS IN POST-OFFICES.

As stated in my last annual report, the Department had been endeavoring during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, to better, wherever possible, the conditions of the postal employees, especially so in the cases of clerks in post-offices, there having been, in my opinion, very great inequalities and injustice in the compensation of this class of employees. To remedy this inequality more than 12,000 clerks were promoted during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, nearly all of whom were receiving less than $1,000 per year compensation, and it was the intention of the Department to continue this equalization and promotion in the lower grades of clerks during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, but for the reasons hereinafter stated it was found impossible to do so, much to my regret. In order to enable the Department to deal in a practical way with this subject, I earnestly recommend that Congress make a "lump-sum" appropriation for clerks in first and second class post-offices, instead of appropriating for clerks by grades, as at present.

The acts of Congress making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1900, and subsequent years, have defined and specified the number of clerks in each grade in first and second class post-offices from $100 to $3,200. Prior to July 1, 1899, the appropriations for clerks had been made in a lump sum. The present plan originated in Congress, and is in line with the method of making appropriations for the Executive Departments. Although this segregated appropriation became effective July 1, 1899, it was not put in operation until July 1, 1900. Apparently the Department found it impracticable to fit the number of clerks in first and second class offices to the number fixed in each grade in the appropriation, and the law was therefore construed to mean that so long as the total appropriation was not exceeded it made no particular difference whether there were more clerks in one grade than appropriated for by Congress. The records show that on July 1, 1899, the number of clerks in certain grades exceeded the number defined in the appropriation, and no attempt to comply strictly with the law was made until the beginning of the present fiscal year.

APPLICATION OF THE LAW.

A proper construction of the law had been requested of the Comptroller of the Treasury, who decided that the Department was not authorized to allow a greater number of clerks in any one grade than specified in the appropriation law, increased by 5 per cent.

It then becam necessary to fit the number of clerks in first and second class post-offices into the grades fixed by Congress, and our experience has clearly demonstrated that this method of appropriating for the general postal service is cumbersome and unsatisfactory, if not wholly impracticable. While no clerk was actually reduced in salary, it was necessary to cancel more than 3,400 promotions previously authorized. In certain grades all promotions recommended by postmasters were allowed; in other grades very few, thus causing great dissatisfaction among the clerks. It was difficult to explain to the clerks why promotions from $900 to $1,000 were allowed, and promotions from $800 to $900 refused. In some instances we were compelled to jump grades, allowing $200 promotions, and many of the additional clerks were allowed at higher salaries than recommended by the postmasters—a seeming extravagance. We are now paying out of the appropriations for temporary clerks and for substitutes in place of clerks on vacation, 250 regular clerks at $900 each, an unsatisfactory method, but absolutely necessary under present conditions, in order not to cripple the postal service. However, after taking advantage of the 5 per cent transfer clause in the law, the number of clerks does not now exceed in any grade the number fixed by Congress.

INTERESTING EXTRACTS FROM THE REPORT OF THE FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

I also recommend a new classification act for clerks in first and second class post-offices, creating a number of new positions and abolishing the titles of all clerks below the grade of foreman, simply designating as "clerks" employees whose duties are purely clerical.

In the estimates submitted we ask a lump-sum appropriation for clerks in first and second class post-offices. If Congress shall deem it advisable to continue the present method of segregating the appropriations, we have prepared estimates accordingly.

CLERKS IN FIRST AND SECOND CLASS POST-OFFICES.

Prior to July 1, 1899, the appropriation for clerks in first and second class post-offices was made in one sum. For the fiscal year ended June 30, 1900, and for subsequent years Congress has segregated the appropriation into grades, and has defined the number of clerks in each grade from $100 to $3,200. The decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury, rendered April 8, 1903, that the Department is not authorized to allow a greater number of clerks in any one grade than specified in the appropriation act, necessitated a revision of the allowances previously authorized and the cancellation of a number of promotions. It is manifestly impossible to estimate with any degree of accuracy the number of clerks required in each grade during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, and yet that is what is required under an appropriation in its present form.

Owing to the rapid growth of the postal service it is not practicable to allow at the beginning of each fiscal year sufficient clerks at every office for the entire fiscal year. The Department must meet emergencies as they arise and increase or decrease the number of clerks from time to time, so that there will be no delay in the prompt handling of the mails. I am convinced that the most economical plan is to have an appropriation for clerks in post-offices in one sum, and that the present method of segregating the appropriation into grades should be discontinued The present appropriation for clerks in post-offices is as follows:

For regular clerks at first and second class offices, $18,113,900, segregated into grades, from $100 to $3,200; for substitutes for clerks on vacation, $200,000; for temporary clerks, $20,000, making a total of $18,513,900 available for clerk hire at first and second class post-offices. Estimating the increase in the number of first and second class offices at 125 at the next annual readjustment, I am of the opinion that $20,000,000 will be required for clerk hire. I therefore recommend that the appropriation of $20,000,000 for clerks at first and second class offices, including compensation to substitutes for clerks on vacation and for temporary clerks, be requested. This is an increase of $1,486,100 above the appropriation for the current year, or about 8 per cent. The growth of the service, as shown by the gross revenue for the last fiscal year, is about 11½ per cent. If this ratio of increase is maintained, the estimate for clerks in first and second class offices is too low, and it will be necessary to increase the estimate for clerk hire.

If the appropriation is not made in a lump sum, but segregated into grades, a much larger appropriation will be required, since a safe margin must be left in each grade, and as the allowances can not be apportioned economically on the first day of the fiscal year for the entire year, the appropriation must be increased sufficiently to allow for lapses.

The act of Congress classifying clerks in post-offices, though defective in many particulars, fixes the maximum and minimum salary of all classes of clerks in first and second class offices. No one has ever contended that the salaries of clerks in post-offices, under this law, are too high. On the contrary, the need for a revision of the classification act is to provide proper titles and to increase the maximum salary in certain grades. As the maximum salary of clerks is fixed by law, there is no economy in segregating the appropriation into grades. However, if it is desired to continue the appropriation by grades, I recommend an appropriation of $20,614,500, segregated into grades from $100 to $3,200, and an appropriation for temporary clerk hire and for substitutes in place of clerks on vacation of $250,000. This estimate involves an increase in the segregated appropriation of $2,500,600, and a reduction in the appropriations for temporary clerks and for substitutes for clerks on vacation of $150,000, or a net increase in the appropriation for clerks at first and second class post-offices of $2,350,600. This estimate provides for 12,150 promotions, 11,297 of which are in grades below $1,200.

A statement showing the present appropriation for clerks in first and second class post-offices, and the estimates by grades, follows:

Promotions.—On July 1, 1903, all clerks in first and second class post-offices receiving less than $800 per annum who had rendered satisfactory service during the preceding fiscal year were allowed increases of at least $100. Unfortunately, in the grades between $800 and $1,400 there were not sufficient vacancies to allow of merited promotions, and a large number of deserving clerks were necessarily denied increases. In the grades above $1,400 there were sufficient vacancies to permit of promotions of superintendents and others where increases were warranted by the importance of the positions and the capabilities of the employees. These facts furnish an additional argument for making the appropriations for clerks in first and second class post-offices in one sum rather than by grades, as canceling promotions in the $800, $900, $1,000, $1,100, $1,200, and $1,300 grades naturally caused much dissatisfaction. However, the aggregate sum allowed for promotions was very large—about $1,000,000.

Bonds of post-office clerks.—Under the act of June 13, 1898, assistant postmasters at first, second, and third class post-offices, and cashiers at first and second class post-offices, and, when deemed necessary by the Postmaster-General, other employees of first and second class post-offices are required to give bond to the Government for the faithful discharge of all duties and trusts imposed upon them. Under this law 5,039 assistant postmasters at Presidential offices are now under bond to the United States, the amounts ranging from $1,000 to 25 per cent of the bonds given by the postmasters. All cashiers at first and second class post-offices, finance clerks, stamp clerks, money order and registry clerks, and clerks in charge of stations are under bond (these being positions of financial responsibility), and about 50 per cent of other employees, the latter being bonded upon recommendation of the postmasters. The law gives the post-office clerks the right to furnish either a personal or corporate surety.

The Department recently secured information as to the rates of premium charged by the various surety companies, which were found to be not uniform in different sections, but governed by competition, and has placed this information in the hands of postmasters for the guidance of employees. This will undoubtedly enable clerks to obtain surety-company bonds at a minimum of cost.

Classification.—The service has to a certain extent outgrown the "classification act" passed in 1889. The maximum salaries should be raised in certain grades, and where practicable fixed on a percentage basis, and in a few instances the minimum salaries should be lowered. The title of "chief clerk" at second-class offices should be abolished and that of "assistant postmaster" substituted. Some additional titles should be created.

In the present law the maximum salary of superintendents of registry and superintendents of money order is less than superintendents of delivery and superintendents of mails, while the maximum salary of assistant superintendents of registry and assistant superintendents of money order is greater than assistant superintendents of mails and assistant superintendents of delivery.

The salaries of superintendents of divisions, cashiers, and auditors should be placed on the same basis, not to exceed 45 per cent of the postmaster's salary, as now fixed for superintendents of mails and superintendents of delivery.

The salaries of assistant superintendents, assistant cashiers, bookkeepers, finance clerks, secretaries, etc., should be fixed on a percentage basis, not to exceed 30 per cent of the postmaster's salary.

A number of additional titles should be created, such as superintendents of carriers, superintendents of inquiry, chief stamp clerks, inspectors of stations, night superintendents, and assistant superintendents of stations.

Such titles as separators, assorters, general delivery clerks, etc., are superfluous. All persons in first and second class offices employed in a purely clerical capacity should be designated as clerks.

The following is a complete classification of clerks in first and second class post-offices proposed to take the place of the present law:

"CLASSIFICATION OF CLERKS AND EMPLOYEES IN FIRST AND SECOND CLASS POST-OFFICES.

CLERK HIRE FOR THIRD AND FOURTH CLASS POST OFFICES.

The present appropriation is for separating mails at third and fourth class post-offices. I am convinced that allowances for clerk hire should be made at the third-class post-offices irrespective of whether they have separating service or not and in addition to the allowance for separating service, provided the postmaster devotes his full time to the duties of the office.

The attention of Congress has been repeatedly called to the necessity of an allowance for clerk hire at the larger third-class post-offices in the annual reports of the Department. It does not seem fair that a postmaster should be compelled to pay out the greater portion of his salary for clerk hire. The extension of the rural free-delivery system has curtailed the separating service and necessarily the allowance for this service. This has affected more especially the larger third-class offices and furnishes another argument for authorizing clerk hire for local work. During the current fiscal year the law giving the Department authority to make allowances for clerk hire on account of separating service or unusual business only has been rigidly enforced, and therefore the necessity for amending the law as indicated is more apparent than ever.

I recommend, therefore, that the law be amended and the Department be authorized to make allowances in addition to the allowances for separating service, as follows:

Not to exceed $600 at all post-offices where the salary of the postmaster is $1,900 per annum.

Not to exceed $500 at all post-offices where the salary of the postmaster is $1,800 per annum.

Not to exceed $400 at all post-offices where the salary of the postmaster is $1,700 per annum.

Not to exceed $300 at all post-offices where the salary of the postmaster is $1,600 per annum.

If this authority is given the Department, it is estimated that it will require an appropriation of $1,700,000 for separating service and for clerk hire at third and fourth class post-offices. This is an increase of $400,000 above the present appropriation.

In the small fourth-class post-offices the allowances for separating service should be made as additional compensation to the postmaster, since there is not sufficient local work to keep the postmaster employed and there is no necessity for a clerk. I recommend that section 3859 of the Revised Statutes be amended to read:

"The Postmaster-General may designate offices at the intersection of mail routes as distributing or separating offices, and where any such office is of the third or fourth class he may make a reasonable allowance to the postmaster for the necessary cost of clerical services arising from such duties, or, in the case of small fourth-class post-offices, allow additional compensation to the postmaster out of the appropriation for separating service."

The words in italics show the amendment proposed.

The estimates, appropriations, and expenditures for clerk hire for third and fourth class post-offices since 1899 are as follows. Prior to July 1, 1899, expenditures on account of separating mails were paid from the appropriation for clerk hire at first and second class post-offices.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is clearly new legislation, and I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. RIDER. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Cashiers, chief stamp clerks, night superintendents, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of inquiry, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, superintendents of registry, and superintendents of second-class matter, seventeen, at $2,700, $45,900.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I make the point of order first as to cashiers. The law now fixes the salary of these officials, as I understand it, at a maximum of $2,600. This proposes to increase it to $2,700. The same with reference to the chief stamp clerks. I also make a point of order against the provision for night superintendents. There is now no such place, and this section proposes to create that position. The same with reference to the superintendent of carriers; there is now no such place. The same with reference to the superintendent of inquiry. These are all new places created by this paragraph. The same with reference to the superintendent of second-class matter; there is no such place under existing law and this law creates this new position.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky rises to several points of order. Does the gentleman from Indiana wish to be heard?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I simply rise, Mr. Chairman, to know what several designations the gentleman referred to.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The points of order are as follows: "Cashiers." The point of order is that it is a change of existing law. The maximum salary now allowed by law is $2,600, and this bill provides for a compensation of $2,700. The "chief stamp clerk," exactly the same point of order. The maximum now allowed is $2,600. The next designation is "night superintendent," and the point of order there is different; it is not that it is a change of existing law, but new legislation. There is no such place known in existing law as "night superintendent," but it is a creation of a position. "Superintendent of carriers" is new legislation; no such place known to existing law. "Superintendent of inquiry" is new legislation; no such place known to existing law. The "superintendent of second-class matter" is new legislation; no such place known to existing law.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, first as to the cashiers and chief stamp clerk which are now designated positions. It is true that that raises the salary and ought to be stricken out; it was intended for the next lower item. I concede that. As to "night superintendent," "superintendent of carriers," "superintendent of inquiry," and "superintendent of second-class matter," it is true there are not at present positions of those designations. There are, however, employees at the salaries carried in this item now discharging those duties and so designated on the roster. It is not the creation of new offices; it is simply new designations of places now in operation.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If new designations, then it is new legislation.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It would be, it is true, but it was thought better to give these employees a designation that was in harmony with the real service they were performing. It does not create any new position; it is simply a new designation.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Isn't there the same appropriation in this bill for these people who are serving in these positions? In other words, does not this bill in other places carry these assistants the same as the last bill carried them?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No. I will say to the gentleman that there is not any increase in the number of employees mentioned in this particular paragraph. To explain more in detail——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. This increases their salary, however.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Not as to the individuals who are doing the service of superintendent of inquiry, nor to those doing service as superintendents of second-class matter, nor as to night superintendent. These men are getting the same salary for the same work that we appropriate in this particular item. We seek to give only a designation in harmony with the service which they are rendering. I concede that as to the cashiers and the chief stamp clerks the point of order would probably lie.

I concede further that technically a point of order would properly lie as to the designation of the night superintendent and these other superintendents which I have just indicated; but it would leave the same men in the service at the same salary designated by positions which are not as proper as these designations given in this paragraph. The law passed last year authorized twenty of these men mentioned in this particular paragraph. Inasmuch as only seventeen are now in the service, it was believed that there would not be in all probability any more needed, and we only authorized seventeen, the number which is now employed, making a reduction as far as authorization goes, of three. I think the gentleman will appreciate the value of the new designations on the assumption which I make, based upon the testimony of the First Assistant Postmaster-General's experts that these particular duties are now being performed by employees at these specific salaries. While it is true that it is a change of legislation, it would not be such a change as would ordinarily justify a point of order. If the point of order is sustained it would simply leave it as at present—the same employment at the same salary under other designations not quite as much in harmony.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I am one of those common-place, plebeian believers in the old-fashioned virtue of economy—"cheeseparing," if necessary. I notice that a great many people use the term very contemptuously when referring to the expenditure of other people's money—the public's money. I notice that no man is very fond of despising it when he refers to the expenditure of his own money. He cheesepares then just as much as he can. Now, I appreciate what the gentleman has said. He admits that the point of order does lie as to the cashiers and as to the chief stamp clerks, and I shall insist upon it. He then appeals to me not to make the point of order on these other places, although he admits it is new legislation. I would not ordinarily insist upon it, but I think I ought to. I have never served upon this particular committee, but upon other committees I have found this, that whenever you start in a bill a "new designation," you start a new route for promotion.

I am tired of all the expenditures of the Government taking the routes of new positions and promotions of people in office in Washington and around in the places here. It seems to me that more of the money ought to be expended for extension of the service in the country at large and less of it for salaries and increase of salaries here in the city of Washington. I know that as a practical matter, although, perhaps, in this particular bill expenditures will not be increased by changing the designation to "night superintendents" and "superintendents of carriers," "superintendents of inquiry," and all that, yet additional expenditure of money will follow on future appropriation bills. It puts these men in the highest class here, receiving this amount of money, and fixes it as the maximum toward which clerks in the Departments are to be promoted, and it just helps get a way to put favorite men in places at salaries exceeding what they already receive. It will appear from the bill hereafter that night superintendents receive $2,700 a year. When there is a favorite in the Department whom they want to promote, they will simply make him a "night superintendent," a "superintendent of inquiry," or something else. If he is left on the clerical roll, as he was originally, he has got to stay there, or else he has got to get not only a new designation for promotion, but new duties in addition. And he ought not to be promoted unless he has new duties in addition to the new designation.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I do.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman from Mississippi intends to insist upon it I would like to make a little more explanation. I will ask the gentleman if he has yielded the floor?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, no; I do not yield the floor. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I did not want to ask a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I yield to the gentleman to make such explanation as he chooses.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, the committee has sought in the preparation of this bill not only to insist rigidly upon the segregation of the various items of appropriation in order that hereafter the House, as well as the committee, might be more fully informed of the specific expenditures, but has sought also to make clearer and more definite the designation of employees for whom those appropriations are made. It is well known that in the many thousands of post-offices throughout the country, the many hundreds of first and second class post-offices, a very large number of clerks are employed.

Necessarily, as incident to the dispatch of this service, the designation or titles of these clerks have become more or less confused, and for the purpose of giving proper title to the employee, consistent with the service which he is performing, the committee has acted largely upon the recommendation of the First Assistant Postmaster-General and the chief of the salary and allowance division in fixing titles which are more nearly in harmony with the duties which those officials are now performing. There is no need now of the additional employees provided for in this item. We are not prepared to say just where the increases occur and for what purpose.

This further fact I desire to call to the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], that under a segregation of appropriated items, both as to amounts of money appropriated and as to the titles of the employees for whom the appropriations are made, it is made far more difficult for expenditures to grow for purposes other than those intended by the Congress. Not only that, but the limitation, the constant tendency on the part of the House—which this committee shares in and approves—for further restrictions of the designations and the segregations into their proper items, make it so that they can not make a promotion unless there shall be a proper vacancy in order to create a position to which the promotion may be made.

For example, there are now employed in the offices throughout the country of the first class seventeen men drawing salaries of $2,700 a year. They are performing service for the Government. They are positions which have been heretofore authorized and for which appropriations of a similar character have been made. We make no increase in that number. We do curtail the authorization of the present law from twenty such individuals to seventeen, in order to restrict them to the exact number now employed.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is it not a fact that the Post-Office Department recommended twenty-six of these employees for the ensuing fiscal year?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The First Assistant's Office made an estimate of twenty-six; but in a supplemental estimate which they made it was agreed that seventeen, the present number, would be ample for the ensuing year.

We pressed the inquiry relative to the authorization of twenty, how many of that twenty would properly be needed in the present year, and learned that none of them would probably be needed and we assumed they probably would not be needed next year. Hence we asked for an additional or supplemental recommendation which is in conformity with the present law.

Now, I have no criticism to make upon the suggestion of my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I am quite in accord with his views relative to the common-sense, everyday methods of framing appropriations with reference to the individuals who do the work. That is just what we are seeking to do by giving these officers designations or, if you please, titles which correspond with the duties now imposed upon them. Take, for instance, "night superintendents." In a few of the larger cities, which must necessarily keep open the entire twenty-four hours, a night superintendent of the office is just as essential as the day superintendent. In the service at these offices there is, if you please, a night shift of employees, corresponding with the night shift in great factories or other large establishments.

It is true at these offices there is now taken for such service a man of the designated class because the duties at night are equally responsible and important as those in the day. In many cases the incoming mails and the preparations for outgoing mails are exceedingly important during the night service.

It is true that men are now performing this service without bearing these designations. In one office the man assigned to this duty may be superintendent of mails, in another he may be superintendent of the registry or money order who is pressed into service to do the work of a night superintendent.

Not only that, but the practice has grown up of designating, for instance, some man as acting cashier, because the duties are of equal responsibility with those of that rank, and there is no vacancy to which an appointment for that service may be made; and upon such a one there may be imposed the duty of a night superintendent, or a superintendent in charge of the classification of the second-class matter which goes out of and comes into those few very large offices.

Therefore, if we can not only segregate the item of appropriation so that the House and hereafter the committee may see more clearly and definitely just what the appropriations have been made for and how nearly accurate the expenditures have been, we shall then be in a position to legislate more accurately and satisfactorily. In the same way, if we give a proper title or designation to these individuals doing this service, it will be equally in harmony with our own interests for a more careful review in future of the expenditures before we make additional appropriations.

So far as the appropriation is concerned, it will not make any difference whether a man who may be doing the work of a night superintendent is a superintendent in the registry division, or a superintendent in the registry division may be doing the duty of examiner of second-class matter—it will not make any difference if that particular office be abolished as to designation and given the designation which will bring the title of the officer into absolute harmony with the duties of the position. I say that in respect to these matters the appropriation will make no difference.

I believe that the gentleman from Mississippi upon reflection will agree with me as I agree with him in the effort for close scrutiny of the items of appropriation and expenditure—the closest scrutiny of the service of the employee consistent with the duties devolved upon him.

While a point of order, I admit, would lie against these changes of designation, and while we would get along in the long run, yet in harmony with the honest efforts of the House, as well as the members of this committee, to give a still closer scrutiny to these expenditures, it would be better not to insist upon the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Let me ask why the committee did not extend these designations farther down in these clauses?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I admit that the change of designation in the succeeding paragraphs is subject to a point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman did not allow me to finish the statement of the point I was about to make.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Probably not.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I was making a preliminary statement, in order to base upon it the question why did not the committee in each of these clauses say how many "night superintendents" there should be; how many "superintendents of carriers," how many "superintendents of deliveries" they were appropriating for? Now, in the agricultural appropriations, when we made a special designation—and it was generally a very unfortunate experiment, by the way, when we did so—we designated always the number of officers of the particular designation.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will say to the gentleman that the First Assistant and the experts from his office explained to the committee the confusion existing in the various offices to which I have referred by reason of an employee doing the work of a particular line under a designation which clearly did not indicate the line of his service. Accordingly they prepared a list of these positions corresponding with the salaries which the men were to draw in these several offices, changing the designations to meet the conditions.

We adopted in the bill that classification, with the changed designations of the offices, so that whatever number of men are today doing the duty of night superintendents at a salary of $2,700 would continue to perform the same duty at the same salary but under the designation of night superintendents, whatever may have been their designation heretofore. Neither did the First Assistant's office or the Post-Office Committee seek to substitute an officer and then by the substitution create a vacancy which we have filled by a lower grade. We have not done that.

I will say to the gentleman that we have made some provision for promotions in the cases of the first and second class clerks. That provision is designated by our segregation of these separate individual items, so that we know exactly where these promotions go, and then they can not appoint any more. If we fix seventeen men in this particular item under these designations they can not appoint a single additional man, and, therefore, if the gentleman should insist upon his point of order and these new designations should go out of the bill, it simply reverts to the existing conditions, and where these employees are serving and performing this service under other designations they would continue the same character of service at the same amount of salary.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Does not the gentleman from Indiana concede that it would be very much better to specify in the bill the number of employees in each class?

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is true, and I think I could indicate the number, but I can not say what offices they are in.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will allow me?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. I desire to add a word in answer to the question propounded by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], as well as that just put by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH].

I wish to explain to the gentleman that the committee has inaugurated a method of designation which will enable it to get such data, so that in the next bill we shall be able to segregate and specify the number of men in these different offices doing this work, respectively; but as long as these men continue under the old classification to perform duties that are virtually not included under the designation for which they are receiving a salary, it is impossible for the Post-Office Committee to ascertain exactly how many men are employed and how many additional officials will be needed in the future.

This classification as embodied in this bill is an endeavor in the right direction, because next year we can call upon the First Assistant for a statement of the number employed in each respective grade. In fact, let me say to the gentleman from Mississippi that the First Assistant Postmaster-General desired absolute authority which would supersede the proposed segregation. He wanted us to vest him with the absolute authority in the distribution of $20,000,000 for clerk hire, and furthermore he desired to have retained the interchangeable clause which was carried in the last bill, providing for 5 per cent interchange of any of these classified appropriations among any of these various classes; but the committee struck out the interchangeable clause.

It has limited the expenditure of these sums in every particular where consistent with the service, and if the gentleman will withdraw his point of order the new classification will result in the betterment of the service. Certainly in this bill as it now reads not one additional employee is created in these higher grades. What matters it if these men receiving twenty-seven hundred dollars are named according to the designation proper to their work or that which is misleading?

It will be an aid to the Auditor in more closely scrutinizing the expenditures in the Post-Office Department. As the Auditor explained, there are 138 segregations, and it is our purpose to insure the Auditor a means of adequately checking the disbursements in the Post-Office Department; but if you allow the old system to prevail, where men do work under designations which are not applicable to their specified names, the Auditor will be hampered and the committee and Congress will always be at a disadvantage in ascertaining the conditions and needs of the Department.

So I ask the gentleman, in furtherance of this plan to secure a more satisfactory means of legislating for the Post-Office Department, to withdraw his point of order to these proposed changes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi rose and was recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I simply wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi to a specific case which will be affected by the point of order. The item in the existing appropriation law provides for twenty superintendents of delivery and superintendents of mails at twenty-seven hundred dollars, and those are the only designations under which twenty-seven hundred dollars is authorized to be paid. Now, there are seventeen persons in those classes. It will be perfectly evident to the gentleman from Mississippi and to all of the other Members of the House that in a city like Chicago or New York it is necessary to have a day superintendent of mails and a night superintendent of mails. It is necessary to have a superintendent of carriers and it is necessary to have superintendents of delivery. It is necessary to have superintendents of inquiry.

Now, under the existing law, all of these places are filled. They are called superintendents of delivery or superintendents of mails, designated as so-and-so. A designation is made, but on the roster they are called, under the appropriation law, "superintendents of mail" and "superintendents of delivery," and the gentleman will very readily understand that a superintendent of mails in the daytime and a superintendent of mails at night become mixed in their titles unless there is a designation of one as day superintendent of mails or general superintendent and one as night superintendent. And without a designation defining the difference between the two persons there is a mixing not only in the office but in the accounting to the Government, and this, as I understand, is the only purpose of putting in these provisions. I do not know why the other designations are made in the bill.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman from Mississippi will yield to me for a moment—a while ago, in stating the definition of cashiers and chief stamp clerks, I do not want to be understood that that makes a new position, new salaries, nor that it makes a promotion of old salaries or increases old salaries. These two designations are exactly like these others. For example, with a fixed situation of designations of the employees, they would, under their authority of appointment of superintendents of mails—having authority to appoint more than they were using—appoint a superintendent of mails at $2,700 at a certain office, and utilize him as a cashier or as a chief stamp clerk.

Now, we seek under their recommendation, because the assistant recommended that that particular individual be designated with reference to the position which his service calls for——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman will excuse me for asking him a question?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I am quite willing to answer questions to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I find, for instance, a chief stamp clerk. Now, the maximum allowed for that by law is $1,700.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Quite true.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And yet he is given $2,700 under this. Will the gentleman point out to me in this bill where a saving is made of that difference?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The law——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Here are these men now increased in salary at one jump $1,000. The maximum allowed for a stamp clerk is $1,700, and you are giving him $2,700.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, in what other part of the bill is that expenditure cut off?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Let me explain. As I stated a while ago, the present law authorizes twenty men at $2,700 each. These men are not given the designation exactly as carried in the item of the pending bill, but under the authority of law which the Department has heretofore had in appointing a man at $2,700 they would appoint a man—Mr. Jones, for example—at $2,700, and give him the name of "chief stamp clerk" in a large office. The gentleman is in error when he says that the maximum which the law allows the "chief stamp clerk" is $1,700. There is no allowance in the law for "chief stamp clerk." The law is for "stamp clerks;" but heretofore, at some of the large offices, like New York, Chicago, and Boston, only a few——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Of course, I could not make the point of order on the word "chief." Where there are stamp clerks somebody has to be the chief. Now, the stamp clerks are paid $1,700. Now some of them are designated "chiefs" and paid $2,700.

Mr. OVERSTREET. No, it does not operate that way. There is no law to-day for a "chief stamp clerk" at $1,700 or any other salary. The only law is for "stamp clerk" at $1,700. In some of the larger offices where they have a number of stamp clerks—say at Chicago or New York—they appoint a man as "superintendent of mails," having that authority, at $2,700, and assign him to the control of and having charge over all the stamp clerks, and they call him the "chief stamp clerk" in their nomenclature in the local office. But in his designation under the law they call him "superintendent of mails."

Now, we seek to connect closely the employee with his service and make such provision for his compensation as that service justifies, and if now they are employing a man under the title of "superintendent of mail" as a "cashier," and another under a title authorized by the law as "superintendent of registry" as a "night superintendent," we authorize the same number of men at the same salary, but we designate the one as a "cashier" and other as "night superintendent."

I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi that we do not take advantage in the after part of the bill of having created apparently cashiers at $2,700, and promote a cashier of $2,600 to that position. We do not do that. As I said, there are provisions for promotion purposes purely in the bill, for first and second class post-office clerks, but this is not one of them. They are in the lower grades first, being a limited number of the $1,700 to $1,800 grade, but the largest number being in the $600 grade.

We have reduced the amount of appropriations for purely promotion purposes more than half what it has been in any recent year.

Mr. MANN. And you have not half done justice to the post-office clerks, too.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That may be true. If we have erred at all the error has been in the interest of economic administration rather than an extravagant administration.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I am glad to yield.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. In this bill do you provide for any more $2,700 offices than have been provided for in the previous appropriation bill?

Mr. OVERSTREET. We provide for less by three, and in the next item we provide for seven less than the present law authorizes.

Mr. MANN. And in the next paragraph you provide for four less.

Mr. OVERSTREET. And in the next paragraph we provide for four less.

Mr. MANN. And every one ought to be provided fully in the interest of the service, too.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That shows the difference of opinion. As I stated, the effort of the committee was, first, to segregate carefully the appropriation so that each appropriation should be expended for its particular purpose; second, to so designate the employees in the segregated items that each employee would perform the service exactly for which he was paid, and if we have erred I am inclined to think it is more in the interest of economy in the amount of appropriation than in the line of extravagance.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule upon the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. OVERSTREET. I trust that the gentleman will not insist upon his point of order, as it would simply throw things back again in a confused condition.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I shall insist upon the point of order with regard to cashiers and with regard to chief stamp clerks. I will waive the point of order as to the designation for them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Mississippi. The Chair understands this goes to the first four words of the paragraph.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Cashiers, chief stamp clerks, night superintendents, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of inquiry, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, superintendents of registry, and superintendents of second-class matter, twenty-one, at $2,600 each, $54,600.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order, on page 3, in line 16, "chief stamp clerks," that it is a change of existing law. The present pay of stamp clerks is $1,700 and this clause gives certain of them, to be designated as chief stamp clerks, $2,600 each. I will not interfere with the designation; I will not make the point of order upon the designation. I make the point of order that this is a change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana wish to be heard?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I concede that occupies the same relation as the preceding paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order as to the three words in line 16, "chief stamp clerks."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, it goes without saying that this point of order will have to be accompanied by a reduction of the gross sum. That will have to be taken care of.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, just a moment. That is quite true, except this: There are now, for example, in the first paragraph, seventeen men performing that service, and their respective salaries are $2,700 each. They are not all designated just as they are here.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Of course the point of order will require the gentleman to offer amendments later on to take care of that.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I assume that, not as to the amount, but we will offer the amendment so as to provide the same officer who is doing the service; otherwise you have taken out of the service some one who is now employed.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Chairman, here are stamp clerks. Stamp clerks are paid $1,700. It is easy to detail one of them to be superintendent of his fellows and let him still serve at $1,700. I object to making him a "chief stamp clerk," and then promoting him to a $2,700 place, or have a separate allowance when taken from some other duty. It ought not to be done, and a $1,700 stamp clerk can serve as chief of stamp clerks without an increase of salary.

Mr. OVERSTREET. But I state to the gentleman——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I do not want a $2,700 man serving as a chief stamp clerk.

Mr. OVERSTREET. How is that?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I do not want a $2,700 man serving as a chief stamp clerk. Let a stamp clerk who knows the business and receives $1,700 serve as chief, if he chooses, and continue to receive the $1,700 a year.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I quite agree with the gentleman that the total will have to be modified in accordance with the amendment, but I am not quite prepared to say just now just how many of these men there are receiving $2,700 who are now doing this service which is called that of "chief stamp clerk."

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the committee whether, after consideration, he thinks the totals will have to be changed?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do not. I said I was not prepared to state that.

Mr. COWHERD. I thought the gentleman admitted that the gentleman from Mississippi was right, that the totals would have to be changed.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. How many chief stamp clerks are provided for?

Mr. COWHERD. If the gentleman from Mississippi understood the statement of the chairman of the committee, he remembers that they were designated under these different names——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. How many men will be required to fill the positions of chief stamp clerks under this clause in line 9?

Mr. COWHERD. I do not know; I can not say. We provide that only a certain amount may be expended, and that covers only seventeen men. There may be ten night superintendents, five cashiers, and two chief stamp clerks, or they may be divided in some other way; we do not know. The fact is, in the last bill we provided for twenty superintendents of delivery and superintendents of mail at $2,700, and we cut it down to seventeen. We objected to the custom grown up in the service of putting a man in a position and calling him superintendent of delivery, or superintendent of mails, and detailing him to some other business. They said to us that in the great offices where stamp clerks sell millions upon millions of dollars' worth of stamps they had to have a high-class man in command of these people; and for that reason they put a superintendent there in control of the force. We said if you are going to have him there, you ought not to have him there as a superintendent of mails or a superintendent of delivery, you ought to have him there at some designation or name that shows the business he has to do. And therefore we simply changed the nomenclature but cut down the appropriation. We cut down the number of high-class men allowed, and simply changed the nomenclature.

You have got to have in the great post-offices of the country, like Chicago and New York, bringing in to the Government millions and millions of dollars a year, a man capable of handling that amount of money, or supervising the men that handle it; you can not afford to put a man there on too meager a salary. We have already cut this down, in my opinion, as much as the good of the service can stand. And so, if the gentleman from Mississippi insists on striking out the nomenclature, I hope that the House will not cut down the amount appropriated. The Department tell us they must have the men; and if you leave the amount appropriated the same, they can get them under whatever momenclature you adopt.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I think there are only two men now employed in the positions, one at New York and one at Chicago.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, having made the point of order as to chief stamp clerk, and the chief stamp clerk being only a stamp clerk, and the stamp clerk now receiving $1,700, and being informed by the chairman of the committee that there are two of these now in the post-offices, and the difference between $1,700 and $2,700 being $1,000, and there being two of them, I move to reduce this lump sum from $45,900 to $43,900.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman will accomplish his purpose by that amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I move to strike out "forty-five" and insert "forty-three."

Mr. MANN. That will not accomplish the gentleman's purpose, because the words "chief stamp clerks" have gone out, and so stamp clerks are not in this item at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I understand that.

Mr. MANN. Cutting down this appropriation would not affect the stamp clerks.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman is right; that will have to be put in afterwards, where the stamp clerks are provided for. I move to strike out "forty-five" and insert "forty thousand five hundred."

Mr. MANN. We have passed that item.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that while the Clerk was reading the other paragraph the gentleman from Mississippi called the attention of the Chair to the fact that the totals had not been changed. The Chair thinks that it will be in order to change them now. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi and the gentleman from Indiana that if there are a number of these paragraphs which are in any way dependent upon or affected by this, these paragraphs might be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That is what I intended to do and what I asked to do, but the gentleman from Indiana objected.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi would not accomplish the purpose which I think he intends to accomplish by the amendment. There are to-day employed in offices of the first class seventeen men at salaries of $2,700 each. The law has authorized such designation and such payment of salaries. If, therefore, we seek in a proper way by proper nomenclature to designate the seventeen men according to the services which they are now rendering, and a point of order is made to the nomenclature and the Chair strikes it out, as he must under the insistence of the gentleman to the point of order, that does not change the status of the service of these men, for they are now employed.

To illustrate: Two men are employed, one at Chicago and one at New York, the two great post-offices of the country, at salaries of $2,700 each. Whatever their designation may be, assistant superintendents or superintendents of registry, or mails, or what not, they are engaged in the employment which the law has authorized and at the compensation already fixed. If, therefore, you reduce the total on either of these paragraphs those men would come to Congress under the deficiency bill and Congress would appropriate the amount which it had failed to carry in the proper bill.

The gentleman may believe that an individual known now as a stamp clerk, at a salary of $1,700, is of sufficient caliber to discharge the duty of control over a large number of other stamp clerks, and even though he is not called chief his duty would be equally well performed, and therefore would insist upon striking out the nomenclature which this bill carries; but, Mr. Chairman, I submit that if at New York or Chicago there is some individual properly designated under existing law at a salary of $2,700 who is discharging his duty in that service, it does not strike him out nor modify his compensation under the law. Therefore, I agree with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD], who has stated clearly that you can not reduce the total without reducing the service.

Now, if they do not need that man at New York or at Chicago, then he ought to be stricken out. If they do not need another $2,700 man at either of these great offices to perform that service, even though he may now be properly designated as a superintendent of mail or a superintendent of registry, then he ought not to be in the service there. But there is no contention by any man, not even the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], that that service is not proper; and if you strike down the total, even if it should result in the man's removal it would necessarily result in the crippling of the service at those two great offices.

I submit to the gentleman that while we all agree that the closest scrutiny should be made and the fullest and fairest possible explanation given, not only as to appropriations, but as well to expenditures and titles of employees, that we also all agree that in our zeal we do not desire to cripple the service in any respect. The result will be that the striking out of the chief stamp clerk or cashier—a point of order because it changes existing law as to nomenclature—would still leave the service under the same method of discharge which is now in operation in those great offices.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, just a few words, because I do not want to be put in the attitude of being unduly factional. I do not want to be unduly critical, but this bill is very awkwardly constructed. Whenever the Post-Office Committee will bring in a bill here, a special bill, to reorganize the Post-Office Department, I will give it my most cordial and earnest support, but there ought not to be an attempt to reorganize the Post-Office Department upon an appropriation bill, and, besides, if an attempt is made to reorganize the Post-Office Department it ought to be done in a definite and specific way. There were twenty employees under certain designations receiving $2,700. They are segregated, and then, instead of saying that there shall be two cashiers, one chief stamp clerk, two night superintendents, three superintendents of carriers, or whatever might have been the number of each one of these men under the new designation, this bill reads awkwardly, "cashiers, chief stamp clerks, night superintendents, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of inquiry," etc., without giving the number of each, and we are placed in this queer position.

The Post-Office Committee does not know and does not pretend to know how many cashiers there will be, how many chief stamp clerks, how many night superintendents, how many superintendents of carriers, how many superintendents of inquiry. I submit that is too general and too vague and too indefinite a reorganization of the Post-Office Department; so I shall insist upon the point of order.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as to the point made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], it follows with absolute certainty that if the words "chief stamp clerks" and the word "cashiers" go out, and there are two chief stamp clerks, and they go out of the bill and they are paid $2,700 under the clause here, that $5,400 goes out of the bill at that place. Whether it is put back some place else or not is another question.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. There is no cashier, no chief stamp clerk, to-day employed anywhere at a salary of $2,700; but there is some individual designated——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, I understand that.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Very well. Therefore, if you strike out the cashier and the chief stamp clerk, you do not strike out the men who are doing the service under another designation.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman does not understand me. I understand him perfectly. It may be that the gross total of the bill itself will not be reduced, but the gross total of this paragraph must be reduced.

If the gentleman wants to put somewhere else in the bill the two twenty-seven hundred dollar men—stricken out here on a point of order—or the one twenty-seven hundred dollar man stricken out on a point of order as a cashier, then it might come in at a subsequent point in the bill; but so far as this particular paragraph is concerned, of course when provision for those men is stricken out their pay is stricken out. They may come in under the old law, which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD] has in his hand——

Mr. COWHERD. The gentleman says they can come in under the old law. The old law reads, "superintendents of delivery;" and you leave here the words, "superintendents of delivery." So, when you strike out the "chief stamp clerk" and the "cashier," you merely strike out the names, if you intend the service still to be performed; and instead of having five superintendents of delivery and two stamp clerks you would have seven superintendents of delivery. So that the gentleman does not reduce the appropriation in this item unless he means to strike out the service of those men.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I do mean to reduce the appropriation; and if my point of order lies, I have reduced the appropriation. When I strike out "cashiers," who are at present allowed $2,600, I strike out $100 of the salary here proposed. When I strike out "two chief stamp clerks," at $1,700, I strike out $3,400. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] may put them back somewhere else in the bill under a different name and provide for them at these salaries; but my intent is not that, whatever else may be the intent of the gentleman from Indiana. My intent is that cashiers in that Department shall not be paid $2,700, but $2,600, as now; and my intent is that stamp clerks shall not be paid $2,700, but $1,700, as now, regardless of the fact whether you call one a "stamp clerk" and the other a "chief stamp clerk." If the effort should be made later on to put these men back in the bill under another designation, I shall resist it; but I submit that, the point of order having prevailed, the reduction ought to take place in the gross sum of the paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is very evident that if these officers are to be retained at all they ought to be retained under this item in the appropriation bill. The suggestion of the gentleman from Mississippi that they can be put back somewhere else in the bill is futile, because this is the only item in the bill——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I do not want them put back.

Mr. MANN. I am saying it is not possible to do it. This is the only item in the bill which carries positions at salaries of $2,700; and an amendment, if offered to another place in the bill to accomplish the same purpose, would be subject to the point of order which the gentleman from Mississippi informs us he would promptly raise, because he is opposed to such a provision.

Now, let me suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi and other gentlemen of the House that in New York the postmaster sells from twelve million to fifteen million dollars' worth of stamps a year. Those stamps are not under the immediate supervision of the postmaster; that is an impossibility. They must be under the supervision and in the custody of some official appointed for the purpose, who is held responsible for those stamps and for their disposition. The suggestion made now by the gentleman from Mississippi is that a mere stamp clerk, any one of the stamp clerks, without any increase of pay, shall have imposed upon him the increased responsibility of taking charge of all the stamps in that office and all the people who sell the stamps, a suggestion which I think the gentleman, upon reflection, would not insist upon. He would not insist that a man who has under his charge this vast amount of stamps, and who is responsible for them and responsible for the people who sell them, should have no more pay than a man who stands at the stamp window and hands out the stamps to purchasers.

So, I say, Mr. Chairman, that these two offices now being filled and necessarily being filled, one at Chicago and one at New York City, it would not be possible in the House to cut down the salaries. I had an objection to the report of the committee because they reduced the number of employees at this salary. There seems a general disposition in the House just now to increase the pay of the rural free-delivery carriers at the expense of the city service. The city service ought to be given at least a reasonable chance for existence. The city of New York and the city of Chicago each turns over to the Government for aid in the transportation of the mails, both on the railroads and on the country roads, from five to eight million dollars a year; yet in the face of this fact the committee itself, in its report, has not given to these cities fair provision for the clerical help required in those post-offices; and here is a proposition to still further cripple the service.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. As I understand this provision, it is not proposed here to increase the salary of anybody. My understanding is that the salaries provided in this provision are the same as are given under existing law. Now, this being true, I can see no good reason why the totals here should be reduced.

It was all very well, on the point of order made by my distinguished friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], to strike out the designation "chief stamp clerks." That was a designation pure and simple, one which merely changed another designation, and the provision as it stands with the point of order sustained does not increase the salary of a single individual carried in this paragraph. That being true, the total should not be reduced.

Mr. STAFFORD. I move to strike out the last three words, in order to speak to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

I hardly think, with all due deference to the gentleman from Mississippi, that he is consistent in his position when he insists on reducing the number of clerks in this class of twenty-seven hundred dollars by two. He has withdrawn his opposition to the nomenclature as provided in this bill, because it will enable those who are now performing the work to be more properly described than heretofore under the designation of "superintendents of delivery" and "superintendents of mails."

It is not denied that seventeen men are now employed in necessary service in the various post-offices of the country at twenty-seven hundred dollars a year. If you strike this number down to fifteen you necessarily hamper and impair the service to an extent that you can not estimate. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi, as well as other gentlemen of the committee, to the fact that segregation in these various classes as to clerkships has been a matter of but recent origin, dating only from 1901.

If you reduce the number by two, you surely cripple the service to that extent, where they are now necessarily employed. The gentleman says he has no objection, so far as these other designations are concerned, to a proper and more specific description, and yet he is insisting that some men who to-day are employed—and necessarily employed—shall not be employed hereafter.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If the gentleman thinks I am illogical about it, I will renew the point of order to the designation.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not objecting so much to the gentleman's inconsistency. I approve of his withdrawing the point of order, for I believe it was done with a desire to better the service. But in this particular there are seventeen men now employed. If those two men are doing duty to-day as chief stamp clerks under the designation of superintendent of delivery and superintendent of mails, you must confess and admit that they are performing a necessary service. This bill last year provided for twenty men at twenty-seven hundred dollars each. The Department only availed itself of seventeen. It is a fair presumption to say that they were necessarily employed at a salary of twenty-seven hundred dollars. We are not increasing the present force one iota. Strike this down to fifteen and you cripple the service to that extent. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi will not prevail.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last five words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves to strike out the last five words.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, at an early day of the present month I introduced in this House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to have the Director of the Census investigate the subject of public-road construction in the United States, and to obtain and compile all available statistics from the different States, counties, and municipalities which may tend to show the cost of construction, as well as maintenance, of roads built under legal authority during the past few years, and also the amount and character of the indebtedness thereby incurred, when and how payable; and to ascertain also the States whose constitutions prohibit them from engaging in works of internal improvement, as well as those which permit them to authorize the issue of bonds for the construction of highways; and also the aggregate mileage of public roads in the several States and Territories; and, when the investigation is completed, to publish these statistics in the form of a bulletin for the information of the public in connection with the bills pending in both Houses of Congress looking to a uniform system by which better roads will be constructed throughout the country and more efficient mail facilities thereby furnished to the people.

This resolution is self-explanatory. In asking that the revenues of the National Government be applied in part to the improvement of our public roads throughout the Union the only sensible and practical thing to do, in the first instance, is to have the Census Bureau gather the data here called for, in order that we may have some intelligent appreciation of the probable cost of construction, as well as maintenance, of a well-devised system of public highways, both on the part of the Federal Government and the different communities through which these great thoroughfares are to be built and kept in repair. The scheme, however, is not free from difficulty.

There are two bills pending in Congress—one, H. R. 85, introduced in the House by Mr. BROWNLOW, of Tennessee, and the other, S. 4098, introduced in the Senate by Mr. LATIMER, of South Carolina. The provisions of both these bills are substantially the same.

I want to say, in this connection, that I am in favor of some uniform system of granting governmental aid in the construction of public roads, over which the United States mails are to be carried, at the least possible cost to the taxpayer. To this end I am willing to work with unflagging zeal. Twelve years ago I introduced in the Alabama legislature, of which I was a member, a bill, which became a law, to authorize the board of revenue of Montgomery County to issue $350,000 of long-time bonds, bearing a low rate of interest, and subsequently $100,000 of like securities, aggregating $450,000, the proceeds of which were to be applied and were applied to the construction of our present magnificent system of public highways, which are to be found in every direction in my home county.

While under the constitution of Alabama the various counties and municipalities, under certain limitations, may engage in works of internal improvement, the sovereign State itself can not lend its aid for any such purpose.

To harmonize the different and conflicting constitutions of the various States in such manner that a uniform system of constructing and maintaining these public roads is the great obstacle in our pathway which Congressional legislation will have to surmount and overcome. It is with this end in view that I have offered the resolution which I have just read in your hearing.

There can be no doubt that for many years in the history of this Government one of the cardinal tenets of the Democratic party was opposition to governmental aid for purposes of internal improvement. The party to which I have the honor to belong was in favor of a strict construction of the Federal Constitution and was strenuously opposed to what is commonly termed "paternalism," no matter what guise it wore or from what quarter it came. It set its face like flint against legislation making appropriations for the purpose of constructing roads and canals and improving the navigation of our water courses. As an evidence of this policy, on March 3, 1817, President James Madison vetoed a measure entitled "An act to set apart and pledge certain funds for internal improvements," in short, appropriating money—

For constructing roads and canals and improving the navigation of water courses, in order to facilitate, promote, and give security to internal commerce amongst the several States and to render more easy and less expensive the means and provisions for the common defense.

In his veto message to Congress he employed these words:

The legislative powers vested in Congress are specified and enumerated in the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, and it does not appear that the power proposed to be exercised by the bill is among the enumerated powers or that it falls, by any just interpretation, within the power to make laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution those or other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States.

The power to regulate commerce among the several States can not include a power to construct roads and canals and to improve the navigation of water courses in order to facilitate, promote, and secure such a commerce without a latitude of construction departing from the ordinary import of the terms strengthened by the known inconveniences, which doubtless led to the grant of this remedial power to Congress.

To refer the power in question to the clause "to provide for the common defense and general welfare" would be contrary to the established and consistent rules of interpretation, as rendering the special and careful enumeration of powers which follow the clause nugatory and improper. Such a view of the Constitution would have the effect of giving to Congress a general power of legislation instead of the defined and limited one hitherto understood to belong to them, the term "common defense and general welfare" embracing every object and act within the purview of a legislative trust.

It would have the effect of subjecting both the Constitution and laws of the several States in all cases not specifically exempted to be superseded by laws of Congress, it being expressly declared "that the Constitution of the United States and laws made in pursuance thereof shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges of every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." Such a view of the Constitution, finally, would have the effect of excluding the judicial authority of the United States from its participation in guarding the boundary between the legislative powers of the General and the State Governments, inasmuch as questions relating to the general welfare, being questions of policy and expediency, are unsusceptible of judicial cognizance and decision.

A restriction of the power "to provide for the common defense and general welfare" to cases which are to be provided for by the expenditure of money would still leave within the legislative power of Congress all the great and most important measures of government, money being the ordinary and necessary means of carrying them into execution.

If a general power to construct roads and canals and to improve the navigation of water courses, with the train of powers incident thereto, be not possessed by Congress, the assent of the States in the mode provided in the bill can not confer the power. The only cases in which the consent and cession of particular States can extend the power of Congress are those specified and provided for in the Constitution.

I am not unaware of the great importance of roads and canals and the improved navigation of water courses, and that a power in the National Legislature to provide for them might be exercised with signal advantage to the general prosperity. But seeing that such a power is not expressly given by the Constitution, and believing that it can not be deduced from any part of it without an inadmissible latitude of construction and a reliance on insufficient precedents; believing also that the permanent success of the Constitution depends on a definite partition of powers between the General and the State Governments, and that no adequate landmarks would be left by the constructive extension of the powers of Congress as proposed in the bill, I have no option but to withhold my signature from it and to cherishing the hope that its beneficial objects may be attained by a resort for the necessary powers to the same wisdom and virtue in the nation which established the Constitution in its actual form and providently marked out in the instrument itself a safe and practicable mode of improving it as experience might suggest.

Again, on May 4, 1822, President James Monroe vetoed a bill entitled "An act for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road." In the message which he transmitted to the House of Representatives he used this language:

A power to establish turnpikes, with gates and tolls, and to enforce the collection of tolls by penalties, implies a power to adopt and execute a complete system of internal improvement. A right to impose duties to be paid by all persons passing a certain road, and on horses and carriages, as is done by this bill, involves the right to take the land from the proprietor on a valuation and to pass laws for the protection of the road from injuries, and if it exist as to one road it exists as to any other, and to as many roads as Congress may think proper to establish. A right to legislate for one of these purposes is a right to legislate for the others. It is a complete right of jurisdiction and sovereignty for all the purposes of internal improvement, and not merely the right of applying money under the power vested in Congress to make appropriations, under which power, with the consent of the States through which this road passes, the work was originally commenced and has been so far executed. I am of opinion that Congress does not possess this power; that the States individually can not grant it, for although they may assent to the appropriation of money within their limits for such purposes, they can grant no power of jurisdiction or sovereignty by special compacts with the United States. This power can be granted only by an amendment to the Constitution, and in the mode prescribed by it.

The logic of events, the progress and prosperity of the country, our material growth and national exaltation, the very civilization of the age itself, required the representatives of the people, no matter the name of the political party with which they affiliated, to change this restrictive policy and to recognize and adopt the broader and more latitudinous interpretation which the Supreme Court of the United States, when an opportunity presented itself, placed upon the Federal Constitution.

There can be no doubt, therefore, that such a measure as the Brownlow or Latimer bill, if enacted into a law, would be upheld as constitutional.

It is provided by the Constitution that Congress shall have power to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States. How it shall provide for the common defense and general welfare is not specified. The Supreme Court of the United States decided the national-bank act to be constitutional on the ground that Congress alone was the judge of the necessity of such an act. Under this "general-welfare" clause of the Constitution large powers are vested in Congress, and measures will generally be upheld as constitutional where in the judgment of a majority of this body they are needful, either for the common defense or the general welfare.

In practice Congress has been very liberal in the construction of its powers. It not only supports the Army and Navy, but the Military and Naval academies in which to educate young men especially for that service. It not only builds forts, but improves rivers and harbors, so that they can be better navigated. It has passed the oleomargarine bills to prevent a discrimination against pure butter, and similar measures looking to the health and morals of the people, saying, in many instances even, what we shall eat and drink and wherewithal we shall be clothed. It has indorsed, and continues to indorse, the notes of national banks, in order to give them value, to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars. It not only builds post-roads, but guarantees the bonds of railroad companies for millions of dollars to aid in constructing railways, on the ground that they may in time be needed for carrying the mail and in transporting troops. It has given subsidies to ships and railways, as well as bounties to sugar, made from both cane and beet, and made provision for irrigating arid lands.

A few years ago, upon the report of failure of crops in Oklahoma, it voted rations for the needy boomers, while at the same time it was engaged in constructing proper defenses against future overflows of the Mississippi River. It has laid out magnificent national parks and maintains soldiers' homes and burying grounds. It has passed bills to require railroads to use safety appliances for coupling cars; to tax State-bank money out of existence; to purchase lands, build warehouses, stock and care for whisky; to purchase Alaska; to donate millions of acres of the public domain to corporations; to appropriate money to fire and flood sufferers; to send expeditions to the North Pole; to lend and give money to industrial expositions and world fairs; to grant pensions to soldiers and their wives, and to make pecuniary outlays in many other instances where no provision is made therefor by any express warrant in the Constitution.

All this remarkable character of legislation (some of which I have never approved) is predicated upon nothing more nor less than the implied powers of Congress, and was enacted under what is known as the "general-welfare" clause of the Constitution. Congress is the sole judge as to when and where and how these implied powers shall be invoked under this "general-welfare" clause. In the light of these facts, surely no liberal-minded gentleman ought to object to a measure intended for the benefit of the traveling public, and calculated to redound to the general welfare of the people, on the ground that the same is not justified by the organic law of the land, particularly where it is manifest that the States are unwilling singly and alone to legislate in respect to such matters. Almost any and every thing intended for the common defense and general welfare lies within the province of Congress to be enacted for the benefit of the people.

In the great case of McCulloch v. The State of Maryland, reported in 4 Wheaton, page 316, the question was whether or not Congress had the power to incorporate a bank. And it was held that Congress had the constitutional authority to establish a banking corporation, not in the exercise of a distinct sovereign power or end of government, but as a means of carrying into effect other powers which are sovereign.

Chief Justice Marshall, in the magnificent opinion which he delivered in that case, declared, among other things, the following great truths, to wit:

The Government of the Union is a government of the people. It emanates from them; its powers are granted by them, and are to be exercised directly on them and for their benefit.

While the powers not delegated to the United States nor prohibited to the States are reserved to the States or to the people, there is nothing in the Constitution which requires that everything granted shall be expressly and minutely described.

A constitution, to contain an accurate detail of all the subdivisions of which its great powers will admit and of all the means by which they may be carried into execution, would partake of the prolixity of a legal code, and could scarcely be embraced by the human mind. It would probably never be understood by the public. Its nature, therefore, requires that only its great outlines should be marked, its important objects designated, and the minor ingredients which compose those objects be deduced from the nature of the objects themselves.

Provision is made, in a constitution intended to endure for ages to come, and, consequently, to be adopted to the various crises of human affairs. To have prescribed the means by which government should, in all future time, execute its powers would have been to change entirely the character of the instrument and give to it the properties of a legal code. It would have been an unwise attempt to provide by immutable rules for exigencies which, if foreseen at all, must have been seen dimly and which can be best provided for as they occur.

What a grand and glorious judicial character was John Marshall, "the oracle of American law," not of Virginia alone, but the universal favorite and favored son of this splendid Republic of free, separate, independent, and sovereign States. With a mental vision as clear and strong as the eagle's brilliant eye while gazing upon the fierce splendors of the noonday sun, he foresaw and has outlined for all time to come, as no other man before or since his day has ever essayed to do, the dual yet distinct capabilities and potentialities of both State and Federal governments, acting together, jointly and severally, beautifully and harmoniously, without jar or friction, each seeking the greatest good to the greatest number, and neither abating one jot or tittle of the lawful authority belonging to the other or resulting legitimately from the combined action of both.

The extracts which I have just read, in the McCullough case, from the pen of that eminent jurist, demonstrate that it was an impossibility for the framers of the Constitution to have incorporated in its provisions all of the incidental powers of government, and hence that Congress in the exercise of its implied powers can rightfully enact almost any law which it judges to be useful or necessary for the common defense or general welfare of the people in the broadest and most comprehensive sense or meaning that may be applied to that term.

We are therefore "sticking in the bark" and giving to the Constitution a construction so narrow and technical as to render its provisions nugatory whenever we seek to deny to Congress the power to enact beneficent laws which will give to the people better public roads, particularly those over which the mails of the United States will be transported.

Both of these measures, the Brownlow and Latimer bills, above referred to, are intended to provide for a plan of cooperation between the Federal Government and the various States and Territories of the United States for the construction and improvement of the public roads. Each bill provides for a bureau of highways to be composed of three commissioners, one to be appointed from the political party in power, one from the largest minority political party, and the third to be an army officer from the Engineer Corps, with rank not below that of captain. In providing for a commission the purpose is to free the management and prosecution of the work from political influences as far as possible, and also on account of the vast amount of labor which will be necessary to put the scheme in operation. All the details of perfecting the plan of cooperation is left to the commission, and provides for an appropriation of $24,000,000, to be available as a fund for road construction and improvement, to be distributed among the States and Territories according to population.

Before the States or Territories can receive the benefits of the act they must themselves provide for one-half of the cost of such construction of improvements that may be undertaken and also secure the necessary rights of way. They must then do the work under the rules and regulations of the Bureau and thereafter maintain the roads in good repair. Nothing in this legislation will prevent the States or Territories from distributing their portion of the cost among their civil subdivisions.

The resolution we are now considering seeks important and valuable information, which can be obtained in no other way except through the Department of Commerce and Labor, in which the taxpayers are vitally interested, to be used in connection with these bills, with the wise and patriotic purpose of perfecting "a uniform system by which better roads will be constructed throughout the country and more efficient mail facilities will thereby be furnished to the people." It occurs to me that the adoption of this resolution is the first step to be taken, the initial movement to be made, in the inauguration of the great work before us.

The people are greatly interested in rural free-delivery service. They know that in order to establish mail routes certain "red-tape" regulations have to be observed and that all the requirements of the law as to distance, population, roads and bridges, etc., must be complied with. They want the mail brought to their doors in the country precincts in all respects precisely as the post comes every morning to the residents in the city wards. Good public roads will solve the problem; and in concluding these remarks I can not better describe the situation, as well as the vast benefits and advantages to be derived from good roads, than to quote from Senator STEWART, of Nevada. On one occasion in the Senate Chamber, while discussing this subject, he said:

> When I was at college they gave me a composition to write on the mail system of Rome. In investigating that system I found that the Roman Empire had constructed paved roads nearly all over the vast country constituting the Empire. The mails were carried over these roads with great rapidity. Between the most important points the letter mails were carried as fast as 15 miles per hour by changing horses every 5 miles. The mail system over these roads was almost as effective as modern systems over railroads. Some of these roads were wide enough for four chariots to travel abreast. They were made in the most substantial manner, the ruins of which in many places still remain. From Constantinople around the Mediterranean to Rome, thence to Paris, and to all the principal points that vast region was accessible by means of the magnificent highways constructed for military and postal service. These roads were the foundation of the strength of the Empire. They enabled Rome to march her armies and dominate nearly all of Europe. Without such roads the Roman Empire would have been confined to the country surrounding Rome, and Roman enterprise, power, and domination could never have reached the proud eminence which history records.

Let the resolution be adopted. Let us have the information it calls for. Let the people have light. Let us avoid conflict and confusion, and let Congress, cooperating with the different States and Territories, devise a harmonious and uniform system by which governmental aid may be extended in the construction and maintenance of superb public roads throughout the country with the least possible cost to the taxpayers. "Now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation."

Let our patriotism take a wider range. The well-being of communities depends largely upon good public thoroughfares. The investment will yield the Government compound interest, and, in the face of this self-evident proposition, it is neither fair nor just to put upon the shoulders of an already tax-ridden people the burden of building and maintaining these highways. There resides in the Government at Washington the duty and obligation to do this. Will we fail to come up to the full measure of our responsibilities? Will we refuse to heed the voice of our constituents in a matter so far-reaching in its consequences to them? Will we omit to do our duty in this respect? It remains to be seen. I hope not. I believe not. "He that is sent is not greater than they that sent him." [Applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I was called out when the paragraph beginning in line 6, page 2, was read, but had I been here I should have liked to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the language used in the opening of that paragraph:

> For compensation of assistant postmasters at first and second class post-offices——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Iowa that there is an amendment pending to the paragraph on page 3.

Mr. HEPBURN. I understand that, but I understood the gentleman who just preceded me [Mr. WILEY of Alabama] to move to strike out the last five words. I suppose I am speaking in opposition to that motion.

Mr. MANN. If it will help the gentleman any, I will tell him that there is an amendment pending that does not contain five words.

Mr. HEPBURN. All right; the Chair entertained the other motion, however.

I wanted to ask the gentleman if there was not a confusion in that language?—

> For compensation of assistant postmasters at first and second class post-offices.

As I am advised, there are no assistant postmasters at second-class offices. I have in my hand a memorandum of the law prepared under the direction of the Postmaster-General that bears upon that section. He says:

> The act of Congress classifying clerks in post-offices was passed March 2, 1889, and provides for assistant postmasters for post-offices of the first class, salary graded in even hundreds of dollars not to exceed 50 per cent of the salary of the postmaster. This law provides for the position of chief clerk at offices of the second class, salary graded in even hundreds of dollars, from seven hundred to fifteen hundred dollars, but does not provide for an assistant postmaster. Prior to July 1, 1900, the appropriation for clerk hire at first and second class post-offices included also the appropriation for assistant postmasters and chief clerks. In the appropriation act for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1900, a separate appropriation was made for assistant postmasters, including assistant postmasters at second-class offices. The Department had always construed that the position of chief clerk in a second-class office was identical, so far as the duties are concerned, with the position of assistant postmaster.
> When a separate appropriation was made for assistant postmasters and providing also for assistant postmasters at second-class offices, a rule was adopted not to allow more than 50 per cent of the salary of the postmaster, graded in even hundreds of dollars, for the assistant postmaster in a second-class office.

The objection that I have to this language as found in this bill is this: That it gives the Postmaster-General another opportunity for another secret rule for determining the compensation of chief clerks at second-class post-offices. I would like to know from the chairman of the committee if it is not possible to so modify that that this construction of theirs can no longer obtain, by inserting after the words "assistant postmaster at first-class post-offices" the words "and chief clerk at second-class offices." It will do away with this ambiguity, and do away with this construction.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will answer the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, by saying that heretofore, under the authority cited by the gentleman from Iowa, chief clerks at second-class offices could be appointed at salaries not exceeding $1,500, the law relative to the compensation of assistant postmasters fixing such compensation at not exceeding 50 per cent of the salary of the postmaster.

Mr. HEPBURN. In even hundreds.

Mr. OVERSTREET (continuing). In even hundreds of dollars. Inasmuch as the highest salary allowed under the law to a postmaster of the second class is $2,900, then the maximum allowance to the assistant postmaster, based upon the authority of 50 per cent of the postmaster's salary, would make the assistant postmaster's salary not in excess of $1,500. There was power, however, heretofore under the law for the appointment of chief clerks, and to designate chief clerks at a second-class office at a salary greater than 50 per cent of the postmaster's compensation.

I explained, I imagine while the gentleman was off the floor, the effort which is now being made, first, to segregate most carefully the items of appropriation, in order to keep guard over the expenditures, and, second, to designate the officers or employees in the service in harmony with the duties which they perform. Therefore the same application is made to this item to which he addresses my attention. There is no provision carried in this bill appropriating any sum for chief clerks in second-class offices. It therefore reverts under the nomenclature provided for the item that assistant postmasters would be provided and their compensation fixed at not in excess of 50 per cent of the postmaster's salary, which would result in the maximum allowance being not in excess of $1,500.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does not that operate as a change in the existing law without admitting that it changed it? The law provides that in certain instances the pay of the chief clerk at a second-class post-office may be $1,500. Now, under the method that has been established by the committee in these appropriations to assistant postmasters at first and second class offices, there being no such office as to second-class offices, under the construction made by the Post-Office Department, it occurs that $300, $400, or $500 may be taken from the salary of the chief clerk of a second-class office, a salary that is authorized by the law; and therefore I complain that this change of the phraseology seems to change the law and gives the opportunity for the establishment of a rule in opposition to the will expressed by Congress.

Mr. OVERSTREET. In answer to the gentleman's query, I will state that there are to-day in round numbers about 1,300 second-class post-offices. Out of the entire number of second-class post-offices there are assistant postmasters receiving 50 per cent of the salary of the postmasters in those offices with the exception of about fifty.

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman, but how do they become assistant postmasters? The law says that there shall be chief clerks, and the law fixes their compensation.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I appreciate that what the gentleman says is accurate; but under the law relative to chief clerks, which was passed some years ago, in the effort to designate them under the regulations of the Department, the duties of the chief clerk have been outgrown, and the officer, the individual who does that particular service, who signs the papers authorized by the postmaster to be signed by him in the absence of the postmaster, who does, in a word, all of the duties of the postmaster in his office, are larger and more important duties than were originally prescribed for chief clerks. Therefore, in keeping with the effort of giving designation to the individuals consistent with their service, we seek now to provide for these same individuals as assistants rather than as chief clerks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks that his time may be extended for three minutes. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That began in 1901. Now, I notice the gentleman's expression of fear lest it may result in an advantage which the Postmaster-General may assert in reducing an individual's salary who originally was designated as chief clerk to an amount not in excess of 50 per cent of the postmaster's salary, which he would have under an allowance of an assistant postmaster; but that is not the purpose of it, and I think it is a fear most remote from the probability of actuality.

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman will permit me, I know of such a case as that, and that is the reason my attention has been called to it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, does the gentleman believe that there ought to be an officer in a second-class post-office who is paid more than 50 per cent of the postmaster's salary?

Mr. HEPBURN. I do.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Do you believe there are many such offices?

Mr. HEPBURN. Perhaps not, and I do not know all of them; I know one, however.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the Post-Office Committee whether, if the amendment prevails, it will cripple the service in New York and other large cities in this country?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I feel satisfied that it will cripple the services of New York and Chicago.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. To what extent?

Mr. OVERSTREET. By the reduction of one officer of the $2,700 grade of pay who is now performing service equal to that compensation.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. And does the provision in the pending bill increase the salaries, or leave the salaries as they are now?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No increase of salaries at all on that item, leaving them identically as they are now received by the individuals now performing that service.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendments will be considered withdrawn——

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, just a moment. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the fact that I understood him, when he put his question to me, to refer to the second-class offices, and so answered him. And I think he did intend to; but he did say, in fact, third class.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman is quite right.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendments will be considered withdrawn, and the question recurs on the amendment pending, offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The question which the gentleman from New York has just propounded is filled full, or the assumption under it is filled full, of the usual fallacy that whenever somebody has got somebody in his district who is getting something from the Government the cutting that off is a detriment to the country. Now, there is nothing in that and there never was anything in it. Men are not sent here for that.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Does the gentleman from Mississippi understand that New York has not an adequate force as it is now, and that we are crippled there now and need——

Mr. MANN. And that Chicago has not an adequate force and——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I never knew Chicago nor any one of the great cities that ever did confess that they had sufficient of anything.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. We yield an annual revenue——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Chicago does not confess it is adequate.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. We yield an annual revenue of over $8,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman fro[illegible] the [illegible]ssissippi yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It is useless now I have answered both the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from New York. That is ancient history. Now, will the gentleman from New York go on?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I want to say that the annual revenue from New York City post-office is over $8,000,000——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But you——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Pardon me. And we have not sufficient force and we have not sufficiently adequate quarters or sufficient help or we would need many more; and to now, upon the statement of the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi would cripple the service in New York City, and crippling the service in New York City means crippling the service throughout the country.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Is the gentleman from New York aware of the fact the point of order has been made here this morning and sustained on such items as this?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. No.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I thought he was not; the gentleman came in after that took place. Now, what I am offering as an amendment is something in consonance with the point of order and sustaining the point of order. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to cripple the Post-Office Department in anything, and, God knows, if New York and Chicago ever got out of this Government all that they ask there would not be anything left for anybody else. That is the honest truth [applause], and there has never been a time when the great cities of this country were not very much better served as far as postal facilities are concerned than my district, for example.

They get from seven to eight deliveries a day; they get twenty-seven hundred dollar clerks; they get the mail brought to their doors all the time, and they get special pay to the railroads in order that they may get the mails thirty-four minutes quicker than they could get it otherwise. And under the bottom of it you people from New York and Chicago imagine that when so many stamps are bought and used in your cities it is costing you that much, whereas it doesn't cost you anything, because you charge it in your business accounts. It is a part of your business, and it goes against the consumers all over the country who buy your goods. My people are paying their share of it, my people are paying a part of that expense——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. And we are providing the revenue.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. My people are paying not only their portion of the money that is appropriated in the bill, but paying their part of the stamps you use, because when you stamp a letter and write to them you charge it up to them.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. You wouldn't have anything if it were not for our business interests, and you would not have us pay for the stamps.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. You would not have any business interests if it were not for us. You could not sell your goods if it were not for us.

Mr. MANN. Why not quit corresponding with us?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It is because we can't get along without you; we are fond of you in a great many ways, and you have a great many things that we are still fonder of, and we have got to have them. [Laughter.] I am not saying that you are not doing a good work; but when people from these cities come here and say that they contribute all the revenue derived from their post-offices, that is a mistake. You do not contribute it any more than Kentucky contributes the whisky tax because she happens to make the whisky. It is the fellow that drinks the whisky that pays the tax after all [laughter], and the man who trades with you who buys the stamps you use.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi if the people of these rural districts do not fill up nearly the entire force in the New York post-office with their men and leave very little for our own men?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I don't know. God knows I never filled one of them; none of them are from my district. My experience is that you come very much nearer filling up the rural districts with people from the city, as far as that is concerned.

Now, Mr. Chairman, my object in making the point of order is to call the attention of the House and the country to the crude, vague, indefinite condition of this post-office appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I move, Mr. Chairman, to strike out the last word. I want the attention of the House. In the existing law there are assistant cashiers, for example, who have a maximum pay of $1,400. Now, I find in line 25, page 3, assistant cashiers provided for. It does not say how many, remember that. There is no bridle on the Department, and remember that thiles a Department absolutely rotten from turret to foundation stone. It does not say how many. Assistant cashiers provided for at $2,400. Now, line 10, page 4——

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi where he gets the evidence that this branch of the service in regard to the Post-Office Department is rotten from one end to the other?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. From their own confession——

Mr. PAYNE. Then you don't get it at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And from what is contained in the President's message; that is where I get it.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman knows——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I don't want to be switched off upon this, but I will say that whereas they have only investigated one division of that Post-Office Department, I believe, and I believe that the gentleman from New York believes, that there are other divisions in it equally corrupt and rotten.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Mississippi may know what he believes, but he doesn't know what I believe. I do not believe anything of the kind, and I haven't seen a single man or heard from a single man that knew anything about it the statement that he does. Still the gentleman from Mississippi indulges in the extravagant language that the whole Department is rotten.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. My language is not extravagant. The Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General was asked a question before the Post-Office Committee by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], whether incidentally, in going through the first division, he had not found evidence that there might be occasion to investigate other divisions of the Post-Office Department, and he replied, "Yes."

Now, I was going on. I do not want to discuss that; that was a mere remark, and I am sorry I made it, because it interferes with the argument.

Mr. PAYNE. I think if the gentleman will read what was said by the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General before the committee, he will withdraw that remark.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That was a statement made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] the other day on the floor, and I think it is correct, and I will not withdraw it until I find it incorrect; and I will not find it incorrect upon the bare suggestion of the gentleman from New York, who knows absolutely nothing about it. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. That is entirely on a par with the gentleman from Mississippi——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman from New York does not know; he was not present and does not pretend to know what question was asked by the gentleman from Tennessee, nor what was the answer of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General; he just threw that out as a blind suggestion.

Mr. PAYNE. I only know it from a member of the committee who was present and upon whom I rely.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. What gentleman of the committee has said that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] did not ask that question substantially, and that substantially that reply was not given?

Mr. PAYNE. The chairman of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Ah, does the chairman of the committee deny that that question was substantially asked and answered substantially as I have stated?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will read exactly what it was, which will be a better way.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Was it not substantially as I have stated?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will read the matter and let the committee determine for itself.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If the gentleman will give it to me, I will read it now.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will read it in my own time.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I am not trying to give the exact language, because I neither read it nor is my memory sufficiently good to do that; but the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] made substantially that assertion on the floor.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to go on with this matter I am talking about, I wish to say that I will cheerfully support a bill to reorganize the Post-Office Department. Under the law the pay of an assistant cashier at this time is $1,400. This bill is brought in and we find in it at the bottom of page 3 a provision for assistant cashiers at $2,400. Beginning at line 10 on page 4, assistant cashiers are provided for at $2,200. Beginning again in line 21 on page 4, they are provided for at $2,100. Again, on page 5, line 6, they are provided for at $2,000. Still again, beginning on line 16, page 5, they are provided for at $1,800.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Again, beginning on line 3, page 6, they are provided for at $1,700. Now, I want the committee to remember that the maximum pay for assistant cashiers is $1,400. Beginning again on line 15, page 6, they are provided for at $1,600. Again, on line 3, page 7, assistant cashiers are provided at $1,500. Then, finally, on line 15, page 7, they are provided for at the rate fixed by the present law.

I want to call the attention of the House and I want to call the attention of the country to the crude condition of the bill, and I want to say that I would like to see the Department reorganized by a special bill so systematized that you could put your finger upon every man who is serving the Government in that Department.

Having accomplished this purpose, Mr. Chairman, I am going to withdraw the various points of order that I have made, and I am going to withdraw them for this reason: The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD], in whose knowledge of this subject I have the very highest degree of confidence and in whose honesty and integrity I have unlimited trust, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], the chairman of the committee, able and fit for the place which he occupies, assure me that the only way of segregating these things is to undertake it now in an indefinite way, and that at the end of the next year they will know just how many "assistant cashiers," "night superintendents," and so on there are, and that they can then designate them numerically, and we can begin to have some way of getting at the Post-Office Department expenditures. As it is, I defy any man living who is or is not a member of that Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to tell me how many assistant cashiers there are, and not a member of the committee can tell me how many stamp clerks, night superintendents, and all of these other men there are provided for.

I asked a moment ago how many cashiers would fall under this clause, beginning at line 9, on page 3, and nobody could tell me whether there were one, two, or six. I see before me the gentleman from Pennsylvania who used to help us fix up the agricultural appropriation bill, and I would ask him what he would have thought of an agricultural appropriation bill that did not tell us how many entomologists there were or how many biologists there were?

Mr. Chairman, I want now to withdraw the various points of order I made, but before doing so I desired to show the committee how many of them could have been made, just along that line. I have three pages of them here, all of them on their face changes in existing law or new legislation. In other words, this is an attempt to reorganize the Post-Office Department on a general appropriation bill.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Indiana proceeds, can we ascertain what the result of withdrawing the points of order is as to the two paragraphs which have been passed?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Of course the amendment goes with the withdrawal of the points of order. They carry with them the withdrawal of the amendment.

Mr. MANN. What I desired to know was whether the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] withdrew his points of order on the two paragraphs which have both been read.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Of course. They are the only points of order that I have made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that the clerk had completed the reading of the paragraphs down to and including line 21. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] made a point of order against the first four words in line 9. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] made a point of order against the three words following the first words in line 16.

The gentleman from Mississippi also made points of order against all the new officials designated. He withdrew the points of order as to new officials. The point of order as to the first four words in line 9 and the three words following the first word in line 16 was sustained by the Chair. The gentleman from Mississippi then moved an amendment altering the amount of the total in line 16. The Chair now understands the gentleman from Mississippi to ask unanimous consent to withdraw the points of order which were sustained by the Chair and to withdraw the amendment. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Chairman, in connection with what I was saying a moment ago, I have just seen the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], and it seems I was mistaken as to the exact tenor of the reply of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General. Instead of replying "Yes," he replied, "I beg to be excused from answering that question." Now, I say that that answer was substantially "Yes," because if he could have answered "No" he would have done so. But his answer was, "I beg to be excused from answering that question," and the question was as to whether he had not incidentally found out that perhaps other divisions of that Department needed investigation.

Mr. OVERSTREET rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I share fully the opinion which the gentleman from Mississippi has given in reference to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD] as a member of the committee. I share his approval of that gentleman's ability and his honesty. I am sorry the gentleman from Mississippi could not have extended his confidence to my honesty as well as ability——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, I thought that was understood. I hope the gentleman did not think that I meant to eliminate him from that category.

Mr. OVERSTREET. No, I did not; and I accept the gentleman's explanation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a brief reply to the criticism of the gentleman from Mississippi as to the bill being crudely drawn. I think the more closely members of this committee may scrutinize this bill and compare it with former bills which were enacted into law the more satisfied they will be of the zeal and industry and honesty with which the members of the present committee labored in their effort to accomplish most prominently the two things which I have repeatedly mentioned this afternoon—to segregate as far as possible by language and arrangement the several appropriations in order that the expenditures of those appropriations may be made in accordance with the purposes of Congress, and to segregate the different classes of employment and name them by proper language in order that the duties discharged may conform more accurately in the future to the designations and that we may know by the titles or nomenclature of those employments the service intended to be discharged.

The gentleman complains that we did not give the exact number of employees in each item. That, for several reasons, is practically impossible. First, we have only begun this line of work. The gentleman must remember that the efforts of this committee, sitting almost daily for sixty days, to reach some proper practical conclusion in the line I have indicated could not, in all reason, go as far as the committee would have been glad to go; nor could we in that time ascertain just how many clerks were needed in specific characters of employment. But we did find that there were employees known by law under certain specific designations drawing certain specific salaries, discharging duties of a different character from the service indicated by the nomenclature of the employment.

We have gone as far as we could with the present information. When we have clearly segregated these several items of appropriation, when we have given the employees their proper designations to conform to their service, the end of the year will bring, through the auditing department, the exact amounts of expenditure to these various individuals in the various services, thus enabling us to ascertain the accuracy, propriety, and wisdom of the segregation we have made.

The bill classifies the employees by salaries. We must adopt some method, some system. We could have segregated them by post-offices, and then, instead of having a limited number of items, we should have had sixteen hundred to eighteen hundred items.

But when we found that under existing law and under the plans which this Congress had approved by its action making it proper and legal to designate an assistant superintendent of mails entitled to a $1,700 salary to an employment as a cashier, and when we found, in the second place, that the service was being rendered and was properly rendered, that the man was doing satisfactory duty as a cashier, we felt it entirely proper and we felt it would meet the approval of the House if, instead of leaving the matter in that confused condition, we simply named those assistant cashiers at the same salary they are now drawing.

I wish to commend the intelligence and the zeal and the industry displayed by members of the committee, belonging to both the great political parties, in the hard task which they have had before them in an honest endeavor to give some clearer and more definite provision by segregating the items, so that at the end of a fiscal year there might be brought to that committee, and through it to the House, a fuller and more accurate and therefore more satisfactory explanation of these expenditures.

Just one word more, relative to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], as to the point that the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General either stated in terms or left the impression that the other divisions of the Department, unexamined by him, were equally susceptible to the charge of fraud as those which his investigation had covered. I find on page 249 of the hearings, in the examination of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, the following colloquy between him and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON]. I will read only that part which refers to this particular subject-matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I ask unanimous consent for time to read this short colloquy.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. OVERSTREET (reading):

Mr. MOON. General, your report, which you furnished to this committee by direction of the House, contains specifically, does it, all of the investigations in the various Departments, the items and so on?

Mr. BRISTOW. The report covers the investigation that I made. Of course the exhibits of the report were not furnished, but the report covers the investigations I made.

Mr. MOON. You do not furnish the exhibits, but you give your conclusions in that report?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOON. And that report covers all of the items in this branch of the service we are now investigating?

Mr. BRISTOW. It covers all the items where fraud was discovered.

Mr. MOON. That is what I mean. That is a correct statement of the fraudulent transactions?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes, sir; so far as I could do it.

Mr. MOON. So far as you could ascertain them?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

A little further along, when the subject-matter again recurred, the following took place:

Mr. MOON. Before you leave that item—

Which was an entirely different item—

let me ask this, to save us asking questions and your answering all of these various items in the bill: In your investigation where you discovered fraud you desire the committee, do you, to look to your statement for the facts?

Mr. BRISTOW. I have set forth the facts, as correctly as I could learn them, in that report.

Mr. MOON. It is not necessary to make any further inquiry, if you want us to rely on that; at least I would not.

Mr. GROSVENOR rose and was recognized.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. As the gentleman from Indiana has just referred to a matter——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio suspend to allow the gentleman from Tennessee to make a statement?

Mr. GROSVENOR. For a moment.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The statement, as read from the hearing, by the gentleman from Indiana, covering that question, is entirely correct. I think the gentleman may possibly find in the hearings somewhere else, or if he does not find it in the hearings elsewhere it is because the stenographer was told not to put it down—and there were a great many things we told him not to put down—he will find this question which I asked General Bristow: If in his investigation in matters in the office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General he found anything that led him to believe—that is the substance of it; I am not attempting to give the exact language—that it was proper to investigate matters in the Second Assistant Postmaster-General's Office, or if he found anything that would lead him to believe that an investigation ought to be made in the Office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General? He said in reply that he begged to be excused from answering it, and the question was not pressed.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I am not saying that that colloquy did not occur, because, if the gentleman from Tennessee says it did, he is a gentleman whose word I believe; but it was not the statement which the gentleman from Mississippi first quoted, and in answer to his question I stated that I would read from the hearing.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I was not present when the gentleman made his statement, and so I make this statement now in order to make the record correct, as I understand it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the committee on the most happy and yet the most singular condition of affairs. The chairman of the committee [Mr. OVERSTREET] has stated that he has a very high opinion of the aggregate intelligence, wisdom, patriotism, and everything else that goes to make up a statesman and a good citizen of all the members of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has joined in the certificate, and if he would only furnish photographs it would be found, no doubt, that the whole thing might be seized upon and made use of in the newspapers to advertise Peruna or something of that kind. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Mississippi especially certified to the good judgment and sound wisdom of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD], and the chairman of the committee certifies to his cordial approbation of the statement of the gentleman from Mississippi, and yet no two of them agree about anything in this bill. Here we are hacking away at each other about every item of the bill, and constantly asserting that it is the product of the combined wisdom of the greatest committee on earth. [Laughter.] I do not understand it.

But I rose to say that I want to suggest to this committee whether it would not be wise to go just a little bit further and eliminate the other three subdivisions or grand divisions of the Post-Office Department entirely.

I was furnished yesterday with an official statement, that I unfortunately left at my room, that shows that to-day in the subdivision of the appropriation made by this bill ratifying and carrying into effect the orders of the Postmaster-General that 102,000 employees of the Post-Office Department are under the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, and all the other three, the first, second, and third divisions of the Post-Office Department, have only about 26,000 or 27,000 employees altogether, including the Railway Mail Service and everything they have jurisdiction over. Now, I submit whether it would not be wise if the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General could have all of them transferred under him and let him run the whole machine of the Department himself. I can see no possible reason for it, but step by step great bureaus of that Department have been taken from the other Assistant Postmasters-General and piled up under that single one.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let me finish this statement. I would like to know whether we can not save the salary of these other gentlemen, and let it all be done by a single individual.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think the gentleman does not pretend to say that he has an official statement showing that this bill carries an appropriation for 102,000 employees under the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, I do not know who the official is, but he is absolutely wrong. This bill does not carry anything of the kind. There are only 92,000 employees in the postal service provided for by the entire bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let us see how accurate is the gentleman's statement. How many fourth-class postmasters are there?

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman includes fourth-class postmasters, there are 68,000 of those.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And there are 102,000 altogether, in one great division of the Post-Office Department, and less than 1,200 men in one, all told, everywhere.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman will pardon me again, all of these 68,000 fourth-class postmasters, together with all the other postmasters, are provided for by the appropriation for the First Assistant.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am not talking about the appropriations in the bill. I am talking about the classification that exists to-day in the Post-Office Department. And I am not mistaken. I have the figures, and they have been verified very carefully.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing a paper touching upon the identical question that has given us so much trouble. It is a fair statement by a fair man, who puts his views upon this question involved in a very proper way.

I add the following:

[From the Philadelphia Press, March 15, 1904.]

A MATTER OF "HOT AIR" AND COLD TRUTH.

During the heated debate in the House of Representatives last Friday on postal matters Mr. CLAYTON, of Alabama, said:

"Then, later on, when these enterprising public servants were not content with the horse laugh of that distinguished individual [Postmaster-General Payne] they again asked him, and pressed it upon him, 'What about the Tulloch charges of great corruption and dishonesty in the Post-Office Department,' this man is reported to have said in reply, 'The Tulloch charges are all hot air.'"

Mr. CLAYTON proceeded to stigmatize and denounce Mr. Payne as "Mr. Hot-Air Man." Criticism from other quarters has been directed to the same point. Mr. CLAYTON is right in indicating that this expression, "hot air," was limited to the Tulloch charges. It was not used in connection with the general postal charges, not in reference to a single one of the charges which General Bristow has investigated, though many of the reckless critics have falsely treated it as applying to all. The time has now come when it will not be inopportune to inquire if Postmaster-General Payne's indignant characterization of the Tulloch charges, whether wise or not, was not true and justified.

The Tulloch charges were first publicly made in a newspaper interview in the spring of 1900. They referred solely to the relations between the Post-Office Department and the Washington City post-office, and did not touch any of the matters which have been the subject of investigation during the past year. In substance, they alleged that the Department had forced the Washington office to do various improper things, chiefly concerning appointments. When the Bristow investigation began last year the Tulloch charges were repeated. The Postmaster-General called on various parties—among others, the Comptroller of the Treasury, Judge Tracewell, who had investigated the Washington post-office for the period covered by the charges—to tell what they knew about them. The examiner used for this investigation by Judge Tracewell was one Gilmer, and it turned out that the Tulloch charges were substantially derived from certain papers which had been purloined by Gilmer. All this is set forth in Comptroller Tracewell's letter, dated May 22, 1903, from which the following extracts are taken:

"Mr. Gilmer had gone over the work of the Washington post-office for one whole quarter, and had spent four months thereon. No fraud was discovered. Some irregularities had been discovered and corrected, some claims had been paid from the wrong appropriation, but they had been paid and audited, and under such circumstances, when the amount is small, I do not ordinarily disallow, as it would necessitate it being covered back into the Treasury and again paid and audited from the correct fund. I do, however, correct the practice. This I did in this instance, and not even Mr. Tulloch claims to the contrary. * * *

"Therefore the letter [a letter cooked up by Gilmer to be signed by Tracewell leaving the offices at New York and Washington out of further examination—Editor] did not arouse my suspicion, nor did I then suppose it was obtained for improper purposes. Mr. Gilmer, however, did not have it copied in my office, and when he left he took it with him, and took with him also the original working draft of the demand upon the postmaster for explanations.

"After Mr. Tulloch published his statement I discovered this abstraction [because it was plain to him that Tulloch's statement was based on the purloined papers—Editor] and asked Mr. Gilmer about them. He brought them to my office, and when asked why he had taken them away and given them to Mr. Tulloch he broke down and in tears told me he blamed me for his removal from my office. His removal was not at my instance."

But this is not all. On "the original working draft (thus purloined) of the demand upon the postmaster for explanations" was based a formal letter calling for such explanations. The answer was signed by Postmaster Willett, but it was actually prepared by Mr. Tulloch, who was then cashier and did not expect to be removed. On this answer and on his own investigation Comptroller Tracewell audited and allowed all of the accounts except $931 in amount. Three days after Tulloch was removed he first made his charges privately. Just about the same time an inspector made a report on the same points, and it is perfectly plain to anyone who examines the papers that Gilmer, Tulloch, and the inspector worked together for their own purposes.

It thus appears, first, that the Tulloch charges were based on papers purloined by Gilmer from the Comptroller of the Treasury; second, that Tulloch, as cashier, prepared a full answer to the charges which Tulloch as a dismissed employee afterwards made; and, third, that with Tulloch's answer to Tulloch's charges, and with his own examination, Comptroller Tracewell effectually disposed of the Tulloch charges as set forth in the above extract.

We are now prepared for the next chapter. After the Tulloch charges had been thus shown to be baseless, except as to some minor irregularities, they were, by some strange mistake, referred to Messrs. Conrad and Bonaparte, "special counsel." Their report severely condemns Comptroller Tracewell and, so far as relates to the Tulloch charges, it rests primarily and fundamentally on a full acceptance and indorsement of Gilmer. It says: "In our opinion this (the treatment of Gilmer) constitutes one of the most serious and significant features of the situation developed by the papers laid before us." And among its conclusions this Conrad-Bonaparte report includes the following:

"Tenth. The detail of Thomas W. Gilmer to different work of a lower grade and at a reduced compensation by F. A. Vanderlip, then Acting Secretary of the Treasury, under all the circumstances attending it, was apparently unjust and oppressive and certainly disastrous to the public interest. * * * It seems to have been preceded by no sufficient inquiry on the part of Acting Secretary Vanderlip, and would render proper an investigation of the latter's conduct were he still in the public service."

This reference to Mr. Vanderlip is not only unwarranted but outrageous, as will appear more clearly further on. We may digress a moment to give one of many illustrations of the grotesque character of this Conrad-Bonaparte report. Ex-Attorney-General Griggs, who had some official dealings with Gilmer, was asked by the Postmaster-General for a statement on the subject, and in his reply, dated May 22, 1903, he said:

"The man I have in mind, if it was Gilmer, had manifested a very unreasonable and disagreeable prejudice against the officers of my accounting division, and made himself busy in raising trivial objections on legal grounds to the accounts of my Department, so that at one time the monthly pay of about one-third of my Washington force was threatened with a hold-up and this upon a point which had practically been disposed of for fifteen or sixteen years. I complained to the Comptroller that it was impossible to get along if the accounts of the Department were to be subjected to malicious objections merely to gratify personal spite of one of his subordinates, and I think it was considered for the good of the service that Mr. Gilmer should be transferred to some other position where he would not make so much unnecessary trouble."

And yet the absurd "special counsel," unconscious of their own buffoonery, copy this plain but scorching statement of Mr. Griggs, and then comment as follows:

"While Mr. Heath and Mr. Vanderlip found in the rudeness, offensive manner, and discourteous conduct of Mr. Gilmer grounds which induced the one to complain and the other to act upon such complaint by removing Mr. Gilmer from his position, it will be observed that neither Mr. Griggs nor Mr. Castle assigns any such grounds for their complaint!"

Did anyone ever know pretended lawyers to perpetrate more preposterous tomfoolery?

When the Conrad-Bonaparte report was submitted there was nothing for the President to do, if he accepted and trusted it at all, but to remove Comptroller Tracewell as well as some others. The report sided wholly with Gilmer and condemned the Comptroller, and the President had either to reject the report or reject the Comptroller. Before deciding he very wisely referred the subject to the Secretary of the Treasury for further examination, and the following extracts from Secretary Shaw's report to the President, dated October 9, 1903, embody his conclusions:

"As soon as the Tulloch letter was published I personally investigated the connection of Judge Tracewell with the matters involved. I then reached the conclusion that he had passed a few improper payments. I was convinced, however, that it was an error in judgment, and the amounts were very small. I went over the whole matter with Mr. Gilmer, and I became convinced that this gentleman was seeking to embarrass the Department and his former chief. He injected into his examination every possible insinuation, and was wanting in that measure of frankness which is important in all these matters.

"I inclose herewith a somewhat more detailed statement of these witnesses (witnesses as to the methods of Gilmer) as taken down in my office, and also a potition in the Court of Claims, Edward A. Moseley v. The United States, prosecuted, if I am rightly advised, by Mr. Holmes Conrad. Mr. Moseley told me, as he was leaving the office, that Mr. Conrad made unfavorable comment to him with reference to the technical absurdity of Mr. Gilmer's position. For instance, he rejected vouchers signed by S. P. Langley, Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, because there was no proof that S. P. Langley was Secretary of the Institution. There were a large number of other complaints of that character.

"As nearly all the criticisms of Mr. Tracewell relate to differences between him and Mr. Gilmer, and as Mr. Gilmer is manifestly an unsafe custodian of any man's official reputation, I think the Comptroller should be exonerated.

"I think this further statement is due Mr. Tracewell. I have been in this office for twenty months, during which time I have had occasion to study Mr. Tracewell at close range. I have never detected any trace of yellow, nor any indication that he was wanting in sterling integrity. During the last year Mr. Tracewell's office passed upon 160,000 warrants, covering $3,700,000,000. He disposed of 1,300 appeals and rendered 1,300 written opinions. That he may have occasionally erred in judgment he will not seek to deny. That he has erred from the path of strictest integrity no one has yet presumed to charge."

Of course this report of Secretary Shaw settled the matter. It settled Gilmer and it settled the Conrad-Bonaparte report. It vindicated Comptroller Tracewell. How untrustworthy and even ridiculous the report of the "special counsel," who began their work by violating law, appears in the light of Secretary Shaw's calm and cutting statements! It is even shown that in another matter Conrad himself commented on the "technical absurdity of Gilmer's position"—Gilmer, the purloiner of papers, who is the Alpha and Omega of the Conrad-Bonaparte report. The President doubtless realizes that, under advice either foolish or malign and against his own better judgment, he made a mistake in referring the Tulloch charges, after they were a closed incident, to the "special counsel," but he wisely and admirably extricated himself. His action repudiates the Conrad-Bonaparte report, and the only result is to discredit the "special counsel" as investigators and disgrace them as lawyers. Comptroller Tracewell, who in answer to the Tulloch charges said, "No fraud was discovered," is sustained, and with his justification the Tulloch charges, except as to some irregularities, fall to the ground.

It might have proved wiser if Postmaster-General Payne had remained silent; but, indignant at what he knew to be false and knowing the truth as he did, what candid and fair-minded man on reviewing the case will not say that as a matter fact, wise or unwise, he was right and correct in characterizing the Tulloch charges, not the general postal charges, as "hot air?"

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is their objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents of delivery, assistant superintendents of mails, assistant superintendents of money order, assistant superintendents of registry, auditors, bookkeepers, cashiers, chief stamp clerks, finance clerks, night superintendents, private secretaries, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of inquiry, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, superintendents of registry, superintendents of second-class matter, and superintendents of stations, twenty-five, at $2,400 each, $60,000.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question regarding the paragraph just read, at the top of page 4. As I understand it, it gives the officials in the Post-Office Department discretionary authority to indicate the number and salary of appointees in the different post-offices. Is not that true?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Answering the gentleman, this item appropriates for just exactly the number of men now employed in the various offices. I think it is true that the distribution of these men was made upon an order of the Postmaster-General and the postmasters of the respective cities. It would be, Mr. Chairman, as my friend from New York would admit, utterly impracticable for Congress to designate the exact officers and the number of them for a specific post-office in the country. Under the law the postmasters of the first class, who are the administrative officers of their respective offices, take up these matters pertaining to their individual offices with the Postmaster-General, and they two together determine the number of employees that can be had as the necessities demonstrate.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I beg to differ with my friend from Indiana. I understand that heretofore it has been left to the Postmaster-General or to his subordinates to say whether the postmaster shall have one, two, three, or ten high-salaried clerks or appointees, and I am informed that there is an unequal distribution of these higher grades throughout the different post-offices.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman will pardon me a minute, he will realize, or will appreciate, rather, that these higher-grade officers are based upon the percentage of the salaries of the postmasters. Therefore, with the percentage applied to the postmaster at Buffalo or New York or Chicago you have the basis, and the postmaster at either one of these three places, taking the subject-matter up with the Postmaster-General, would control that office. I am supported in that statement by the testimony of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, who was before our committee and stated specifically that the postmasters were always consulted and an effort made to make a fair distribution.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Now, on the contrary, I had a case that occurred——

Mr. OVERSTREET. At Buffalo.

Mr. ALEXANDER. At Buffalo.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Exactly.

Mr. ALEXANDER (continuing). We wanted to get a high-class clerk at a salary of $2,400, I believe, and I was told in the Post-Office Department that no vacancy existed; that we must wait until a vacancy occurred, because all of the $2,400 salaries had been taken up in other post-offices. From this I assume that it rests entirely in the discretion of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman may not have been present when I stated a while ago—and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD] made a similar statement—that it is our effort now in the careful segregation of these items to endeavor by the report through the auditing offices at the close of the fiscal year to ascertain more closely the proper distribution of such appointments. Notwithstanding, the gentleman will also appreciate the futility of the effort for Congress sitting here in a few days to determine the distribution of these various employees at so many hundreds of offices in the country.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, no, not at all; if my friend from Indiana will allow me, not at all.

Mr. OVERSTREET. But the fact is, as testified before the committee by the First Assistant Postmaster-General, that the postmasters at these several places are consulted and an honest effort is made by the administrative offices to make a fair distribution of the employees.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The committee on appropriations indicate the number of $2,000 clerks, of $1,800 clerks, and of $1,600 clerks that a bureau shall have in all the Executive Departments.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Exactly so; and if we could have before us every postmaster and interrogate him as to the number that would be necessary and lay before the committee the conditions of each post-office, that would be permissible; but owing to the large number of offices we are obliged to leave it to the two administrative offices, the postmaster and the Postmaster-General.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlemen from New York has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question in my own time, if I may. I understood the gentleman to say, in his judgment, that there was favoritism or an unfair distribution of the high-salaried officers.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, no, I beg pardon; I did not say there was favoritism. I say simply this: That some offices have a larger number of high-class clerks than other offices of the same grade, and there should be a rearrangement. That is all.

Mr. MANN. As I would understand the gentleman, I suppose he means that the city of Buffalo ought to have a $2,400——

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am not now referring to Buffalo.

Mr. MANN. I supposed the gentleman was referring to Buffalo because he had had more knowledge there, and I have no doubt he would be right if he referred to Buffalo in that respect, and I want to call the attention of that gentleman and the other gentlemen of the House to the fact that the committee in reporting this bill have not reported a single additional officer with any salary of a considerable amount, apparently going upon the theory that the Post-Office Department in the large cities is to remain without progress, is to remain upon the same plane that it now is—that the receipts and expenditures at the Buffalo post-office will not be increased, and although the Post-Office Department itself in making these estimates recommended an increase in the number of employees in the $2,700 class, recommended an increase in the number of employees in various other high classes, the committee has declined to make any increase whatever of the number of officials of these classes in any case.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the fact, as I have stated, that there was a supplemental statement made to the committee by the First Assistant Postmaster-General that is in exact harmony with the provisions of this bill.

Mr. MANN. I understand, Mr. Chairman, after the committee had gotten hold of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, long after they had made their careful, unbiased estimate, under the influence of these gentlemen they obtained a revision of the estimate—scared, like the gentlemen on the committee themselves have been scared, by the post-office investigation, afraid to do justice to the large cities because they have not as many votes as the rural free delivery, they bring in a bill which proposes to increase the salary of every rural free-delivery carrier over that now provided by law, and not giving the places to the large cities which they are now entitled to by law.

And the gentleman from Buffalo, like the gentleman from New York and the other gentleman from Chicago, having only a small number in the employ, are compelled to submit because we have not the votes. A moment ago the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], one of the brightest minds in the House, made an assault on the cities of Chicago and New York. It is true the post-office business of Chicago and New York is not carried on for the benefit of those cities exclusively. It is also true that the post-office in Punkville is not carried on exclusively for Punkville. They correspond with the cities, transact business interests; but when the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads had its investigation and endeavored to cripple the post-office service in New York and Chicago, it crippled the service throughout the country, including Buffalo.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I rose only to ask that some provision might be made in this bill by which Congress should have the discretion to say where the high-class clerks should go, and not leave it to the Post-Office Department exclusively, and I am pleased to learn from the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads that he is attempting to get a system by which this can be properly regulated.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that Congress will ever appropriate specifically for the number of clerks in each post-office throughout the United States?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Certainly, in post-offices of the first class; and it can be done easily.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has no conception of the number of post-offices in the United States.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman does have a conception of the number of first-class offices in the United States.

Mr. MANN. I will be frank with the gentleman. I would be glad to have it done, although thereby we should dispense with the practice in the House of the log-rolling scheme for the purpose of doing justice to Chicago and New York along with Punkville.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It would take a subcommittee of the Post-Office Committee about thirty minutes to bring in a provision by which these clerks could be distributed fairly among the first-class offices.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Certainly, but my time has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask my colleague the question whether he is prepared in the next thirty minutes to give us a report on what Buffalo requires in the post-office? He says a subcommittee could go ahead and in thirty minutes provide for these clerks.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Buffalo is getting along very well. This is in the interest of reform. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Certainly.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee this question: I understand that during the past few months a board of classification has been engaged in the Post-Office Department revising the salaries of cashiers and assistant postmasters, etc., I would like to know if this bill carries an estimate made by that board of revision, and whether, after the bill is passed, we shall find in various cities in the country that the salaries of assistant postmasters have been cut down and some raised?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, no; there is nothing in here which looks to the reduction of salaries of this class or of any other class. There is nothing in the bill that looks to the promotion of any of this class.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. What was the work of the board of classification?

Mr. OVERSTREET. That board of classification did make a report, and it was after they had made that report to the Postmaster-General that the supplementary estimates were made to the committee by the First Assistant Postmaster-General. We have followed very generally the nomenclature so as to make the designations conform to that. We have followed also the number of employees distributed by salaries which they are now receiving, giving the new designation.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. But no change of salaries?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No change of salaries. There is a provision for the lower grades of $600 and up to $1,700 for pure promotion purposes.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. But no change as a general thing?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Not at all.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill; read as follows:

Assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents of delivery, assistant superintendents of mails, assistant superintendents of money order, assistant superintendents of registry, chief mailing clerks, chief stamp clerks, night superintendents, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of inquiry, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, superintendents of registry, superintendents of second-class matter, and superintendents of stations, sixteen, at $2,100 each, $33,600.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In the estimate made by the Post-Office Department some time ago, they estimated for twenty-five of these positions. Last year the appropriation bill carried sixteen, and the committee now appropriates for sixteen. I would like to ask the gentleman whether any inquiry was made on what the post-office estimate was made for the number twenty-five?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Promotion purposes entirely. Supplementary estimates based on the service without regard to promotion was made at sixteen.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that there ought to be no possibility that the Post-Office Department for superintendents and postal stations should have a promotion over $2,000?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do not attempt to foreclose against that. I do say that the past several years have shown a larger amount for promotion purposes alone in offices of this grade than this present bill provides.

The committee went on the theory that inasmuch as there have been provisions for promotions of the higher grade of clerks in first and second class post-offices in the last few years, we this year would address our attention more particularly to the lower grade clerks for promotion, and we made larger provision for that grade than for the higher grades. It was in the interest of economy and because of the belief that there had been a very fair provision made in the past few years for the higher grades.

Mr. MANN. Yes, I have no doubt the gentleman had that belief. How he acquired it I can not tell. The truth is that the promotions were not made in the higher grades in the last several appropriation bills. The increase in number was for actual service, and there has been substantially no increase in promotion. Every man, I suppose, speaks from his own experience and observation, and I will say that in the city of Chicago there are several postal stations requiring much higher ability than the ordinary second-class post-office.

There is a much greater responsibility attached to them. They handle a much greater quantity of mail. And yet if a man gets in a second-class office because he sells $10,000 worth of stamps, his salary goes up over $2,000. I have in my district men in charge of several stations, at $300 a year, who sell more stamps, issue more money orders, and register more letters than two-thirds of the second-class offices in the United States, and yet you do not propose to give any increase there at all. It is a constant worry to the post-office officials in Chicago to keep many of them in employment there.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman will permit me, I will be glad to read to him from the last report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General on that subject. He says:

In the grades above $1,400 there were sufficient vacancies to permit of promotions of superintendents and others where increases were warranted by the importance of the positions and the capabilities of the employees.

Mr. MANN. That is just what I was saying. It was not carried in the appropriation bill. There was no provision in the appropriation bill.

Mr. OVERSTREET. There were vacancies.

Mr. MANN. That is his opinion—a few vacancies.

Mr. OVERSTREET. He states it as a fact, not as an opinion.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows as well as I do that not many vacancies occur in these places, either through death or resignation, and there were no appropriations made in the appropriation bill. I have no doubt that the gentleman believes that the appropriation bills had made sufficient provision, but he is undoubtedly mistaken in that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to call attention to the fact that in the post-office bill for the fiscal year 1904 provision was made for sixty in the $1,800 grade, and yet only fifty-three are now employed at that salary. This allows the First Assistant a margin of seven positions to promote men from grades below $1,800, if he found there was need for it. He evidently did not find any necessity for this. We can not compel him to promote. All we can do is to give him a leeway in case the service demands it. If he has not availed himself of that power there must be some reason for his not making such promotions.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman takes a special or particular time when there is a vacancy. There is no department of the Government, not a single one, not even Congress, that at some specific time has not a vacancy, and, on the gentleman's theory, when some Member of the House passes away, he would say: "Oh, do not elect any man in his place; we do not need so many men here."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents of delivery, assistant superintendents of mails, assistant superintendents of money order, assistant superintendents of registry, assistant superintendents of stations, bookkeepers, cashiers, chief mailing clerks, chief stamp clerks, examiners of stations, finance clerks, private secretaries, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, superintendents of registry, superintendents of second-class matter, and superintendents of stations, sixty, at $1,800 each, $108,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to make practically the same inquiry of the gentleman in charge of the bill, as to whether it is his intention here not to give any promotions or whether the purpose of the committee is to save all the money it can in this class of work and give it to the rural free-delivery carriers. I want to find out what the real purpose is.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, the present law, the one that passed last Congress, authorized sixty appointees in this particular service. Fifty-three are now in use. The supplemental estimates submitted to the committee for this particular item are just what we here provide. We did not think it prudent this year to make provision for promotions of employees in the postal service receiving as high a salary as $1,800. The very fact that there was a greater demand to-day for larger compensation in the lower grades than has existed heretofore, supplemented by the fact that the lower grades have not received the same consideration by way of promotions in the past commensurate with the service which they have rendered, prompted the committee to adopt that policy. There is no provision made directly for promotions above the $1,700 grades.

Mr. MANN. May I ask upon what the Post-Office Department based its recommendation that there be an increase of twenty in this class—an increase from sixty to eighty? I should like to find out whether the opinion of the Department is worth anything at all.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, yes; I think it is.

Mr. MANN. Well, here they sent in their estimates, and you have not followed those estimates in a single case.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Let me answer the gentleman's question. Their first estimate contemplated a larger number of promotion cases than we felt we ought to authorize. Their first estimate provided promotions up to the highest grade of clerks. We felt that was going too far this year, and we did not approve it. We therefore said to the gentleman representing the First Assistant's office, "We do not want to promote above the $1,700 grades. We do not want to recommend to the House promotions—pure promotions—above that grade. We will grant appropriations solely for promotion purposes—three in the $1,700 grade, and running down to the lowest grade in the service, a very large proportion being in the grades below $800.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman inform us how much more this bill carries than the existing current law?

Mr. OVERSTREET. About $16,000,000, in spite of our efforts at economy.

Mr. MANN. Yet the gentleman says that all these increases would be for promotion purposes. The assumption of the gentleman who proposes an increased expenditure of $16,000,000 is that it requires no brains to manage the postal system. He provides for no increase in any of the grades receiving a salary of over $1,700. That is nonsense on the face of it. The only reason in the world why these increases have not been made, after having been recommended by the Post-Office Department, is that the gentleman wants to take the money to pay rural free-delivery carriers. But I warn him that that will not be done on this bill.

A MEMBER. We shall see about it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents of delivery, assistant superintendents of mails, assistant superintendents of money order, assistant superintendents of registry, assistant superintendents of stations, bookkeepers, cashiers, chief mailing clerks, chief stamp clerks, examiners of stations, finance clerks, physicians, private secretaries, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, superintendents of registry, superintendents of second-class matter, and superintendents of stations, 119, at $1,700 each, $202,300.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to raise a point of order upon the designation "physicians," in line 8, on page 6, as new legislation.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents of delivery, assistant superintendents of mails, assistant superintendents of money order, assistant superintendents of registry, assistant superintendents of stations, bookkeepers, cashiers, chief mailing clerks, chief stamp clerks, examiners of stations, finance clerks, foremen of crews, private secretaries, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, superintendents of registry, superintendents of second-class matter, and superintendents of stations, 122, at $1,500 each, $183,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move pro forma to strike out the last word. I notice that the Post-Office Department recommended 160 of these $1,500 positions, while the Post-Office Committee recommends 122. Now, I have no doubt that the gentleman from Indiana will say that the Post-Office Department revised its figures. Mr. Chairman, if that Department, when it submits its estimates to Congress in December, is not able to tell us intelligently whether it needs 160 employees at $1,500 or 120 such employees, and must afterwards revise its estimates, it seems to me that it is time to have an investigation of the Post-Office Department—not for corruption, but for imbecility. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents of delivery, assistant superintendents of mails, assistant superintendents of money order, assistant superintendents of registry, assistant superintendents of stations, bookkeepers, cashiers, chief mailing clerks, chief stamp clerks, examiners of stations, finance clerks, foremen of crews, private secretaries, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, superintendents of registry, superintendents of second-class matter, and superintendents of stations, 369, at $1,400 each, $516,600.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I move to amend the paragraph just read by inserting, after the words "chief stamp clerks," in line 19, the word "clerk." This was inadvertently omitted in the preparation of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents of delivery, assistant superintendents of money order, assistant superintendents of mails, assistant superintendents of registry, assistant superintendents of stations, bookkeepers, cashiers, chief mailing clerks, chief stamp clerks, clerks, finance clerks, foremen of crews, private secretaries, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, superintendents of registry, superintendents of second-class matter, and superintendents of stations, 445, at $1,300 each, $578,500.

Mr. MANN. I move, Mr. Chairman, to strike out the last word. I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill (because I notice that the Post-Office Department recommended 800 clerks, while the committee recommends 445) what the explanation of this is. These are not high-priced clerks; they are clerks appointed upon a salary of $1,300. Was this a reduction because the gentleman was frightened at the number "13?" [Laughter.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think the gentleman from Illinois, if he were ever fair, would certainly exonerate me from having shown any evidence of "fear" in recent days.

Answering the gentleman's question, Mr. Chairman, I will say we find there are employed of this grade of clerks 418. We make provision for fifty promotions of that grade.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Twenty-seven promotions of that grade, I believe it is.

Mr. MANN. That is without any regard to the enlargement of the service.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman will bear with me a moment. If we provide for 418 clerks of this grade, the promotions would come from the next lower grade, and the difference between the two grades would make the improvement in the service.

Mr. MANN. And in the next lower grade there are now 1,400 clerks. Out of that 1,400 you propose a possible advancement of 27?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No, sir; 50 is the number I have here. This is the class in which we began to make the larger number of promotions. We increase as we go down. The gentleman overlooks the fact that the improved service incident to the increased volume of business does not necessitate as many clerks of the higher grade as of the lower.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the "gentleman from Illinois" is perfectly familiar with the postal service in the large cities; and it does require there, more than in ordinary cases, a greater increase in the higher grades than in the lower. The gentleman, in my opinion, is entirely mistaken on that subject.

Here is a case where the Post-Office Department recommended an increase to 800 clerks. The committee cut that recommendation down to 445. I do not know why this comes about. I have no doubt that it is the same hysteria which permeated the House all last week, which filled the Post-Office Committee, and which has made it impossible to obtain proper business transactions in the Post-Office Department.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the Post-Office Department recently sent a commission to Chicago to examine into the question whether the Post-Office Department ought to make use of the tunnels under the streets in Chicago, and the proposition which had been suggested by citizens and not by the company owning the tunnel was that the tunnel be employed, as it would carry the mail twice as quickly. This commission, which went to Chicago for the purpose of that investigation, have recommended that if the tunnel people will carry the mail twice as quickly that they be permitted to do it without additional expense. It did not require a commission of gentlemen in the Post-Office Department, or of schoolboys, to go from Washington to Chicago to make such a recommendation, or even to cross the street. Everybody knows that if they could get the same service done twice as well for the same money that it would be profitable to the Government. And yet that was the sole result of the labors of these distinguished gentlemen who went out there and came back at the expense of the Government, and I do not blame them for going. I urged that they be sent.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Does not the gentleman know that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General made a different recommendation?

Mr. MANN. Well, I don't know. Perhaps he did not go out there.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I just call the gentleman's attention to that.

Mr. MANN. I have not been informed.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It is in the Second Assistant Postmaster-General's department, and he makes a different recommendation.

Mr. MANN. I do not know about that. Perhaps he knows more about it than the gentlemen who went out there, and I do not doubt it. If their recommendation of 800 additional clerks was of no use to this committee, then their recommendation of other things ought to be of no use. Here is the Department, after years of service, recommending that it would be to the advantage of the service to increase the number of clerks in the $1,300 class 800, and the committee say, "Oh, no; you do not know anything about it. Go back and revise your figures." And because Congress is in fear of the Post-Office Department, and the Post-Office Department has a shake every morning for fear of Congress, they went back, revised their figures, and brought them in as you wanted them

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant cashiers, bookkeepers, carpenters, clerks, clerks in charge of stations, finance clerks, pressmen, printers, and private secretaries, 2,700, at $900 each, $2,430,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in the $900 class the Post-Office Department recommended 3,200 employees and the committee bring in a report recommending 2,700. That is what we call rapid promotion in the $900 class.

I do not expect, although I very much regret to state it, to obtain amendments to the bill to make it what I believe it ought to be, but I say to the gentleman in all candor that the committee have not fairly treated the clerks in the post-offices in the large cities; and if that be the policy of the committee, and is to remain the policy of the committee, it is just as certain as that to-morrow will come that there will be presented to one of the committees of this House which has jurisdiction of the subject a bill putting clerks in the post-offices on an eight-hour basis.

I called the attention of the distinguished gentleman, Mr. Loud, who preceded the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] as chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to a bill which I had introduced amending the eight-hour law, and to the fact also that the bill was not referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and hence could not be held up; and after a talk with him it was suggested to me that it was not desirable for the postal facilities of the country to put the clerks upon an eight-hour basis by law, but that it would be done by appropriation bills.

When I first came into this House the clerks in the Chicago post-office were working for $400 a year, fourteen hours a day; and so far as the length of hours is concerned, that is the condition they will be put back to under the policy of the gentleman from Indiana. You make no reasonable provision for the increase of the service. Nearly all of the increases which are made are in the $600 class, and there is not a sufficient increase there. Ever since I have been in the House the appropriation bill for these purposes has been larger than the estimates of the Post-Office Department. That is because the postal service is increasing so rapidly that between the time of the estimates and the passage of the bill it becomes necessary to enlarge the appropriation.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman inform the committee about what is the per cent of increase in the postal business annually?

Mr. MANN. Well, the per cent of increase in a city like Chicago, I will say to the gentleman, is extremely large. I can not give him the exact figures, but since I have been in this House the receipts have increased from about $5,000,000 to $10,000,000 a year, and there has been no proportionate increase in the expenditures of the office.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman will allow me, I simply want to say that the increase in business is about 10 per cent annually. The increase carried by this bill for clerks in first and second class post-offices is 10.3 per cent. I doubt very much if the increase in expenses ought to equal the increase in business, but we give about the same increase, and I think that is justification for the provision.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman talks about the country at large.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows, as any other gentleman knows, from personal experience, since the report has recently been submitted to the House, that if a man thinks an office in his district of the second class needs clerk hire he has no trouble in getting the clerk hire for it. There is no difficulty in obtaining from the Post-Office one, two, or three clerks where there is any occasion for them. They give these clerks out on the influence of Members; all Members, I think, understand that. But when it comes to giving the necessary clerks to Chicago or New York, it never yet has been done, and probably will not be done so long as those cities grow so rapidly; but it is crippling the service of the Post-Office Department. I have called your attention repeatedly to the number of clerks recommended by the Post-Office Department and the number recommended by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CROMER. I would like to have the gentleman's time extended so as to ask him a question.

Mr. MANN. In your own time I will answer you.

Mr. CROMER. I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Illinois has some reference to a place named "Chicago." I would like to know exactly the location of that place and how large it is?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I may say for the benefit of the House, and in particular for the benefit of the gentleman who has asked me, that undoubtedly before he would know that much he would have to get that information. [Laughter.] His district lies alongside of Chicago.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clerks, clerks in charge of stations, and laborers, 400, at $300 each, $120,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I make an inquiry of the gentleman in charge of the bill? In a letter which was received by the Post-Office Department last summer, under the new régime——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I want to make a point of order, and I do not want to be cut off by the debate.

Mr. MANN. That is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized to make a point of order, and he will state his point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I understand this is an increase.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Which paragraph?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Lines 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14, on page 10.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That has been passed some time ago.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I was trying to follow it as well as I could. It was the last thing I heard read.

Mr. MANN. They passed something without reading; that is a fact.

Mr. OVERSTREET. They passed these items.

Mr. MANN. They passed two or three items without reading.

Mr. OVERSTREET (to Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi). What is your point?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The point of order is that this is an increase—"clerks, clerks in charge of stations, janitors, laborers, messengers, porters, and watchmen, 800 at $500 each." I ask the gentleman if this is not an increase, in lines 9, 10, and 11, on page 10?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that all those paragraphs have been read.

Mr. MANN. I think not. The Clerk thinks so; but as a matter of fact the last two were not read.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, this is not an increase of salary over authority of the present law. But we do make provision for promotion from the next lower grade to that grade of 120—that is to say, we increase the number in that grade, which will make enough vacancies into which 120 of the next grade can be promoted.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That would, I think, be a change of existing law.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Not at all, because the existing law authorizes clerks of that grade without fixing the number.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. At how many?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Why, we have to increase the number from year to year as the service increases. Under that particular item there are 198 now in use, and we provide for 500, for the reason that we want to give these clerks of that service more money; but in the lower grade we take into account the number which we provide in promotion into the higher grade in fixing the number.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Chairman, the point is this: That the number and the salary of the grade is described. That the number of the higher grade is increased, and as a consequence of that there is an increase of appropriation and an increase of the amount appropriated to salaries, and therefore it is a change of existing law. The total number of employees, as I understand, is left undisturbed. You take a certain number of a lower grade and put them into a higher.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman will allow me, I think the gentleman will admit that as the service grows more clerks are needed.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Therefore we can not say that we are limited each year to the exact number which the preceding year's law had permitted.

Mr WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No; the gentleman from Mississippi does not say that; but he says that in that higher grade they are limited in the salary there. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. OVERSTREET. No; we simply do this, if the gentleman will allow me: We simply fix the total number of clerks who are entitled to $500 a year.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The last law authorized 200.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. And the next law will authorize more.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes; and this law authorizes 800.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, I was looking at the wrong item. The present law authorizes 800. There are in use 824 of that grade, so that we provide—I was looking at a different section from what the gentleman had addressed me upon—in that section the same number the present law authorized.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But at an increased salary, is it not?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, no.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Then turn to lines 12, 13, and 14. What have you done there?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The present law authorizes 800 clerks at $500. This law provides the same. I will not be accurate on that.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. In the next clause there are 500 clerks at $400 each.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The present law authorizes 200 and we provide for 500. That is the one I was addressing myself to.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the point of order lies, and I will not insist upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi withdraws the point of order. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moves to strike out the last word, and is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman in charge of the bill whether the clerks at $500 a year are paid out of this appropriation or some other appropriation?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, out of this appropriation.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman says that with so much assurance that I have no doubt he may be correct, but still we made an appropriation last year for 800 clerks at $500 a year, and in the face of that the Post-Office Department sent out this kind of a letter:

In the case of stations receiving $500 or more it has been decided to pay the expenses out of the appropriation for clerk hire—

A wonderful statement—

instead of from the rent, fuel, and light appropriation.

I commend to the gentleman an investigation upon that subject, and what I want to know is whether this appropriation of 800 $500 clerks is to be paid out of clerk hire directly or out of the appropriation for rent, light, and fuel.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I can answer the gentleman. Mr. Chairman, the committee found that under an old ruling some years ago relative to the compensation of clerks at stations—meaning clerks at drug stores which are called stations of the post-office—they had allowed compensation from the item of appropriation for rent, on the theory that it went to the rent of the room and the payment——

Mr. MANN. No matter what the theory was, I understand the gentleman's theory. I want to get at whether there are enough or not——

Mr. OVERSTREET. Let me answer the gentleman. Upon getting that information we made the specific request of the Department to take from all of the positions that were then being paid for out of that item the clerks called for and put them in the estimate for clerks at stations to be paid for out of clerk-hire allowance, and deduct from the appropriation for rent an equal sum of money.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; and the gentleman makes no increase of the number at $500 a year. What became of the money that was appropriated to $500 a year clerks? If they were paid out of the appropriation for rent, light, and fuel, where did the money go that we appropriated?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] has the data before him, and he will answer the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say to the gentleman from Illinois, in reply to his question, that we provide 640 additional places of the $600 grade. That will necessitate vacancies in the $500 grade, but that will allow promotions of some 400 more places in the $500 grade.

Mr. MANN. Now, a very large proportion of these places are known as substations in the city. For instance, I will give the gentleman a case which ought to appeal to his judgment. Here is the case of a man who has a substation in a drug store, employing a clerk at an expense probably of $1,000 a year to attend to the postal business. He gave me a written affidavit last year to submit to the Post-Office Department, showing that the call for stamps alone in his store amounted to more than 100 a day throughout the year, and he sold last year stamps to the amount of $11,839. He issued 2,870 money orders, amounting to $22,293, and he registered 687 letters.

Mr. OVERSTREET. How many drugs did he sell?

Mr. MANN. He didn't sell a single drug because the post-office was located in his store, because he is in a settlement by itself in the city of Chicago, and nobody comes to his store because he sells stamps. His location is at the corner of Seventy-first street and Cottage Grove avenue, a location by itself just as much as though it were off in the country, and yet when the postmaster at Chicago, under the rules of the Post-Office Department, recommended that he be granted an increase from $400 to $500, under all the rules that have been observed by the Department before, they informed him that that could not be done, because, I suppose, the appropriation for rent, fuel, and lights was running short.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is true that under a prior practice the Department did pay for this——

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman misunderstands me. I am not criticising the Department; I am criticising the committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. But we made provisions for these very clerks, the $500 class, the $400 class, the $300 class, the $200 class, the $100 class for promotion to meet the very cases which the gentleman is speaking of.

Mr. MANN. But it makes no provision for these clerks in the bill at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, as I understand this, although the gentleman from Illinois said that he makes no criticism of the Department, it seems that the Department has been using a fund that was appropriated for rent, fuel, and light for the purpose of paying salaries to clerks. Is that true?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I explained that that was on a ruling by an officer that it was in the nature of rent of the room and for fuel and light; in other words, if they establish a post-office station in a drug store, that one hundred or two hundred dollars—these are small items—would go for compensation for the occupancy of the room. The committee took the position that it ought to go to the clerks, and therefore we took out of the rent, fuel, and light item an equal amount to that paid to the clerks and distributed in this way.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I understand, however, that hitherto, before the committee corrected this abuse they were diverting an appropriation for rent, fuel, and light to the payment of clerk hire.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think it is not quite correct to say "diverted," because there was a belief that a lawful construction of it would permit that kind of a thing. They regarded it as rent.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. There could not have been an honest belief to the effect that an appropriation by Congress for rent, fuel, and light was usable for the payment of clerk hire.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman will pardon me——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Somebody in the Post-Office Department must have put an executive piece of legislation on the country when he used an appropriation for rent for the purpose of hiring clerks.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman will recollect that some years ago the practice prevailed in a contract between the owner of a building in which a station was located and the Government of holding that the contract was for the use of the room.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But that was not prevailing at the time of this abuse.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. What I want to ask the chairman of the committee is this: Have you found out who it is in the Post-Office Department that has been using this appropriation for rent to pay clerks?

Mr. OVERSTREET. It has been running on for a number of years.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. So there were a number of them?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I don't know how many.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It does not make any difference whether it is one or a number, but somebody has rendered himself liable for impeachment; somebody has been executively legislating; somebody has been depriving the legislative branch of this Government of its constitutional power and right to say where the public money shall go.

Mr. MANN. It commenced under Cleveland's Administration.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I don't care if it commenced under Abraham Lincoln or George Washington's Administration, and I expect if they commenced it under either one the class of people guilty of it would be barred by statute of limitation, that has permitted so many to escape. But somebody has been doing it recently who is not barred by the statute of limitation. I think the country would like to know, and the House would like to know, whether the Post-Office Committee is prepared to give the names of the executive officer or officers who have been indulging themselves in this abuse, and indulging their people in these salaries, and changing the law that the legislative branch of this Government has enacted by statute at their own sweet will and under the guise that their discretion thus exercised was for the good of the service.

Now, I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows the name of any officer in the Post-Office Department who is responsible for this abuse, so that Congress may know it and the country may know it.
